Mr. LUCAS. I agree with the Senator from New Jersey that we ought to be united. If there was ever a time when the people of the Nation ought to close ranks, it is now. We should forget about the assessment of the liabilities of the past, if there be such; forget about the mistakes of the past, if there be such—and I presume there are some. Now is the time, it seems to me, for the people of the Nation, and especially those in public life, to forget the past and trust in the future, and look the present situation squarely and courageously in the face. We must have unity of purpose and unity of thought, if we are to survive as a free nation.

We are all familiar with the announcement by the President of the United States that he will make a speech to the Nation tonight on the conditions which exist in this country at the present time, as they are associated with world conditions. The Secretary of State has announced that he will go to Brussels for the purpose of meeting with the French, the British, and others in order that they may at least attempt to reach a solution of the difficult problems which are before them in Germany and other parts of the world. On the eve of his departure——

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Let me say, Mr. President, that I am enjoying tremendously the distinguished Senator's remarks. He speaks a great deal of truth. I want to hear him through, but I am due at a Republican conference. I shall appreciate it if he will limit the remainder of his remarks to a question.

Mr. LUCAS. Did not the Senator yield the floor?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I said I yielded the floor, but I am glad to retain it, and yield to the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). The Chair will have to announce that upon the yielding of the floor by the Senator from New Jersey, according to the order previously entered the Senate will stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon on Monday next.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I should like to say, in response to the Senator's remarks, that I shall never agree that we should not profit by the lessons of the past. There are many things in the past which I think we can bury with great advantage, but I think we must always be mindful, in all our official acts, of the lessons of the past.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield before he yields the floor?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I certainly agree with the able Senator that we should profit by any mistakes made in the past. I believe that the last statement which the Senator made in his address was an admirable one. I congratulate him for it. But it seems to me pertinent, when we are talking about a unified America, to inquire how we can be unified when, on the eve of the departure of the Secretary of State upon what is probably one of the most important missions ever performed by any American official, who ever traveled to the other side of the world, we find the majority of Members of the House of Representatives in the Republican ranks asking for the ouster of the Secretary of State. What a tragedy at this hour. How can the Secretary perform his solemn functions under such a cloud? What will the other nations of the free world think of such a charge?

It matters not what we may think about the man. He is the Secretary of State. He is the President's choice. His nomination was confirmed by the Senate. It seems to me that we are playing directly into the hands of Stalin. If I were Stalin—and I believe I understand something about that oriental mind—I would interpret this action as practically an invitation to strike wherever he wished, because he knows, as a result of this sort of procedure, that America is not united, that we are divided, and continue to be divided. With so many reckless and irresponsible charges constantly filling the air, one wonders whether or not some people are gambling with the fate of our country.

Mr. President, I have said little or nothing recently. I shall not be here very long. But I still believe in my country. I believe in the principles and free institutions which it represents. If the Republicans desire to throw the foreign policy into the forum of the Senate and the House of Representatives, there are many things that may be said about some of their so-called heroes who consider themselves practically God Almighty. We on this side of the aisle have remained silent. We have said little or nothing. We have hoped and prayed that America might be united in this crisis, and that political considerations might stop at the water's edge. But apparently that cannot be done.

I thank the able Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. Mr. President, I should like to say that I think we all have the same hopes and the same prayers in these perilous days.

DAVID KARR

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey be kind enough to yield to me?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I yield the floor.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the Senator yields the floor, the Senate will be in recess.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I will retain the floor. I am glad to yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. ANDERSON. I wish to take only a minute, if the Senator will indulge me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. HENDRICKSON. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I was absent when certain remarks were made by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY], but I understand that among other things certain statements were made with reference to David Karr. I rise at this time only to say that in order to protect reputations so far as I can, I think I ought to make it clear that I was a member of a select committee of the House of Representatives, chosen from the membership of the Appropriations Committee, to pass upon a great many cases certified by the Dies committee, or the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

Among those charges were certain charges against David Karr. The charges were examined as carefully as possible by the committee. They were examined in great detail by me. So far as I could find, and so far as any other member of the committee was concerned, no member of the committee found anything in the charges which would in any way justify the assertion that David Karr was connected with any Communist-front organization, or was himself in any way a Communist.

I thought it might be proper to make that statement since it was a matter of official record on the part of the House of Representatives, and that Mr. Karr might be justified in having his reputation protected to that slight degree.

I thank my dear friend from New Jersey very much for his courtesy to me.

Mr. HENDRICKSON. It is a pleasure. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

RECESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the terms of the order heretofore entered, the Senate will stand in recess until 12 o'clock on Monday next.

Thereupon (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, December 18, 1950, at 12 o'clock noon.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received December 15 (legislative day of November 27), 1950:

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY

The following named officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey for appointment to the grades indicated, subject to qualification therefor as provided by law:

To be ensigns

Barbour C. Stokes, Jr., effective January 18, 1950

Robert E. Williams, effective March 7, 1951

Michael C. Fox, effective March, 18, 1951

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MCCORMACK.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

DECEMBER 15, 1950.

I hereby designate the Honorable JOHN W. MCCORMACK to act as Speaker pro tempore today.

SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou whose will is sovereign and supreme, may we now render unto Thee the homage of our hearts and seek to bring our wills into harmony with Thy divine will.

We are daily praying for the dawning of that better day when humanity shall enter upon nobler and more magnanimous ways of living and when everything which estranges men and nations from one another shall be forever supplanted by the spirit of good will.

Grant that we may have the courage to attempt great ventures in brotherhood. May the members of the human family stand to one another in that same relationship of love and peace as Thou dost to each of them.

However desperate and dire our plight may seem to be, may we never be tempted to feel that all that is noble in our Christian civilization is at the mercy of the powers of darkness.

We pray that when anguish and fears grip our souls we may find our joy and strength in the glorious promise that "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee."

Hear us in the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Hawks, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following dates the President approved and signed bills of the House of the following titles:

On December 11, 1950:

H. R. 2365. An act for the relief of the city of Chester, Ill.

On December 13, 1950:

H. R. 483. An act to extend the time limit within which certain suits in admiralty may be brought against the United States.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Woodruff, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4234) entitled "An act to promote the foreign policy and provide for the defense and general welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia"; requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. MCMAHON, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. WILEY, and Mr. SMITH of New Jersey to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ANDREW REMSON, JR.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I know the membership will rejoice with me that an Alabama boy, Andrew Remson, Jr., of Talladega, in my district, has distinguished himself by his career in the United States Military Academy at West Point and has now been elected a Rhodes scholar from Alabama to go to Oxford University for several years.

It is gratifying when young men who have choice opportunities also have what it takes to avail themselves of those privileges. I know that you will all rejoice with me that this splendid Alabamian has taken full advantage of his opportunities, improving them and himself to enhance the pride of all who know him.

This dispatch from West Point appeared in New York newspapers on November 26, 1950:

CADET ANDREW REMSON AWARDED WEST POINT HONOR

WEST POINT, N. Y.—Cadet Andrew C. Remson, Jr., son of Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Remson, 706 Maple Drive, Talladega, recently was presented with a gold star to represent his being a distinguished cadet in academics at the United States Military Academy. Cadet Remson received this honor because of his exceptionally high academic average in the class of 1951. He ranks No. 2 in his class of 480 men.

The academic course at the Academy is very similar to an engineering and social-science course in a university. Each daily recitation is graded, and the total grades are balanced on what other cadets do. Sports, military tactics, and other extracurricular activities are combined with academics in order to develop a well-rounded leader.

After his graduation as valedictorian from Talladega High School, Remson attended Marion Institute for a year. He served in the infantry as a sergeant for 2 years before being appointed to West Point by Representative SAM HOBBS.

At the Academy he has been active in intramural athletics and is a cadet color sergeant. He is a member of the German Club, Radio Club, Art Club, and Railroad Club.

Upon his graduation in June 1951 Remson hopes to be commissioned in the engineers.

On the next day I wrote his parents:

I am thrilled, as I know you are, and deeply gratified that this outstanding boy has already justified the regard I had for his capabilities and for him. In my opinion, this is only the first of the honors which will be his in the career ahead, and I shall always be proud to claim him as my appointee.

You have every reason to be proud to be his parents, as he has to be your son.

That prediction has so soon begun to be verified. On last Saturday, December 9, the Rhodes Scholarship Award Committee meeting in New Orleans selected him to be one of the four Rhodes scholars from the district composed of 6 States, finally chosen from the 12 designated to compete for the high honor.

THE RAILROAD STRIKE

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARDEN. Mr. Speaker, this morning we are at war. Our Armed Forces are engaged in a life-and-death struggle with the Communist forces of China; over 300 carloads of United States mail, official business and personal, is being held up in Washington Union Station alone; military personnel stopped in their tracks; many boys trying to get home and for some it will probably be their last visit, are blocked; military supplies to our Armed Forces are being blocked. All America is being called on to make great sacrifices of their own blood, finances, and so forth, while the members of the Railroad Brotherhood of Trainmen are paralyzing our transportation system with strikes, not just against the railroads but against our Government and have challenged the United States Army. The Government should accept the challenge at once—and see to it that the Chinese Communists should not receive further assistance from any group in America, whether they be railroad unions, through wildcat or "tame cat" strikes, or any other group. I have carefully checked with counsel and the House Parliamentarian, and the Committee on Labor, of which I am chairman, under the Reorganization Act does not have jurisdiction. I wish it did have.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GOSSETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

[Mr. GOSSETT addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix.]

STATEMENT BY MARTIN DIES

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Speaker, on September 22, I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a statement which had been made by the Honorable Martin Dies, former Representative from Texas. The original statement contained reference to the three news services, INS, UP, and AP. Subsequent to this insertion I received many requests for reprints and I presume that with all the requests I had telephonically and by letter, I can very well issue and send out at least a half million copies.

I have also had correspondence with Mr. Dies regarding this statement and he requested that he be allowed to change his statement with reference to the three news services for the permanent RECORD. Therefore, in the permanent RECORD there will be no mention of these news services. I am satisfied that Martin Dies realizes that any reporter assigned to the Un-American Activities Committee by these news services reported the news of the Dies committee objectively and honestly.

While I was not closely associated with newsmen until 2 years ago, I am satisfied that the three news services, the UP, INS, and AP, as well as the great majority of the American press, are free from Communist affiliations and are just as much interested in seeing the country rid of this menace as Mr. Dies is or I am.

THE RAILROAD WILDCAT STRIKE

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, the radio and press are furnishing us with the astounding news that shipment of food, clothing, ammunition, and medicine to our troops in Korea is being held up by the railroad strike. I cannot imagine a greater act of ingratitude or one more unpatriotic. Until comparatively recently, a railroad employee was highly regarded. Lately, however, in a great many instances they have joined hands with members of the CIO and, therefore, have stooped to a very low level.

How anyone who calls himself an American could read the accounts of what is happening in Korea and then feign sickness in order to technically avoid being held in contempt of court is beyond me. I can imagine the feelings of the mothers and fathers who read of this disgraceful strike against the Government when at the same time our casualty list is the largest in history.

If present provisions of law are not adequate to deal with this situation, then I urge you to join with me in immediately providing necessary authority.

PENSIONS FOR DEPENDENTS OF CIVIL WAR VETERANS

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago I received a letter from a very sweet old lady who asked me if there was a possibility of the enactment of legislation that would increase her pension of $36 a month, which she receives as the widow of a Civil War veteran.

Noting that she was receiving a very small award, I wrote and asked her for the details as to her age, claim number, and so forth. When I received her reply I found she is 77 years of age and in great need of additional assistance. I had the Veterans' Administration officials search for the file and I am very happy to report that this morning I am advised the needy pensioner will receive a check for about $1,000 in back pension which is due her. It will be a wonderful Christmas for this old lady and I know it will make her holiday one long to be remembered.

However, the point I want to make is this: Had the Veterans' Administration been operated in an efficient and businesslike manner, this pensioner would have received an increase in her award, to $48 a month, when she reached the age of 70—7 years ago. Because she was ignorant of the law, and because the Veterans' Administration neglected to increase the award automatically, as should have been done, she has been obliged to struggle along as best she could on the small amount of $36 a month.

I believe that there must be many parallel cases in the files of the Veterans' Administration. With this in mind, I suggested that all of the Civil War $36 awards be separated from the files and reviewed to ascertain whether or not the pensioners were receiving all that they were entitled to under existing law.

The first reaction I received to this suggestion was that the Veterans' Administration does not have the personnel necessary for such a survey. Such a statement cannot be condoned. I believe that five persons, working diligently, could review all of these claims—for there are not many—in a week.

It is time the Veterans' Administration officials cease saying that they cannot do this or that service for veterans and their dependents because Congress has not provided sufficient funds for personnel. You and I know that when the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and his assistants come to the Capitol with their requests for money if they are properly presented they are always given what they deem necessary for good service to our veterans.

Congress should look into this situation promptly and carefully.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 296]

THIRD ANNUAL REPORT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ALIEN PROPERTY ADMINISTRATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the Third Annual Report for the Philippine Alien Property Administration for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1949.

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
December 15, 1950.

RESIGNATION AS MEMBER OF CONGRESS

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication:

DECEMBER 15, 1950.

Hon. SAM RAYBURN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SPEAKER: I have transmitted my resignation as Representative in Congress from the State of Wyoming, effective at midnight on December 31, 1950, to Hon. A. G. Crane, Governor of Wyoming. I am herewith enclosing a copy of my letter of resignation.

Yours very truly,

FRANK A. BARRETT.

DECEMBER 15, 1950.

Hon. A. G. CRANE,
Governor of Wyoming,
Cheyenne, Wyo.

DEAR GOVERNOR CRANE: I hereby resign as Representative in Congress from the State of Wyoming, effective at midnight December 31, 1950.

Yours very truly,

FRANK A. BARRETT.

PAN AMERICAN UN. ON

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 5902) for the relief of the Pan American Union, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Line 13, after "organization", insert ": Provided, That the government of the District of Columbia shall reimburse the Treasury of the United States for such amount."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what this bill does.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, this bill passed the House several weeks ago and has for its purpose the refunding to the Pan American Union the sum of $54,691.65 collected by the District of Columbia from that organization on an inheritance tax from the estate of Dr. Leo S. Rowe, who bequeathed the sum of $493,680.44 to the Pan American Union. The legal question has not been settled accurately as to whether or not an inheritance tax is due the District although the Board of Tax Appeals has held that it does. Neither has the Federal inheritance tax question been settled, that is, whether any tax is due the Federal Government.

It is thought that due to the conditions under which the bequest was made by Dr. Rowe and because the Pan American Union is a quasi-public institution, this action should be taken, technicalities under the law notwithstanding. I shall be glad to give further explanation if the gentleman wishes.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURLESON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Does this come in under unanimous agreement of the members of the committee?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MRS. AMLYE E. ASTON

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up House Resolution 884 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House to Mrs. Amlye E. Aston, widow of J. Lee Aston, late an employee of the House of Representatives, an amount equal to 6 months' salary at the rate he was receiving at the time of his death and an additional amount not to exceed $350 toward defraying the funeral expenses of said J. Lee Aston.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHARLES E. WILSON

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, the President will shortly announce, if he has not already, the appointment of Charles E. Wilson as head of what will be the Defense Production Board. Mr. Speaker, this is very bad news for Joe Stalin and very good news for the American people. Mr. Wilson, president of General Electric, is the man who did so much to whip out the guns and planes and tanks as vice chairman of the War Production Board that overwhelmed the Axis from 1941 to 1945, inclusive, and this is the man who can do the job now.

I think that of all of the things that have happened in this country in the last few weeks, when the country was finally aroused out of a dangerous lethargy, this appointment is one of the best. It will mean a striking and potent force of production will be unloosed; especially as it is coupled with the fact that Mr. Wilson will have no strings attached to him, will have direct access to the President, and that he is going to really head up the job.

This appointment bears out the argument on this floor when the Defense Production Act was under consideration that we wanted this economic mobilization job handled by one agency, and not spread around in different Government departments, but in one agency concentrating on this job. This is now accomplished. I think our country has a right to feel very good about it and the Kremlin, I am sure, to feel very bad about it.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. VURSELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 15 minutes on Tuesday next, following any special orders heretofore entered.

PRICE AND WAGE CONTROLS ESSENTIAL

Mrs. BOSONE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOSONE. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many of the Members of Congress do their own cooking in Washington, and I do not think there are many, if any, who do their own marketing. I happen to do both. I get thoroughly exasperated every time I leave a food store with a bag of groceries, and realize how much money I have spent and how light the bag is. I cannot help being worried and concerned about the many low income families in America who have many mouths to feed. There must be thousands who are merely working these days in order to pay their bare living expenses. There must be many these days whose total pay check hardly stretches over their bare living expenses.

If prices are going up any higher, the average parent will not have any money to pay the high taxes to keep our country secure. Some of you may be saying, "Well, if it weren't for labor asking for wage increases prices would not be spiraling." I do not think the facts bear this out. I believe that prices go up first—making living more expensive—and then labor asks for a pay increase. It is time that the vicious spiral leading to inflation subsides. I believe we should begin right now to check rising prices.

The people who are using the war to increase prices are, in my mind, traitors to our country.

I believe that the mandatory price and wage controls must be imposed right now.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LECOMPTE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include resolutions by Poweshiek County, Iowa.

Mr. GROSS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and in each to include editorials.

Mr. WALTER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an address by Msgr. Edward S. Swanstrom.

Mr. HART asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include several newspaper editorials and a book review.

Mr. McCORMACK (at the request of Mr. PRIEST) was given permission to extend his remarks in two separate instances and in each to include extraneous matter.

Mr. LARCADE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. THORNBERRY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. POULSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three instances, and in one to include an article by Charles Wilson.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a resolution adopted this morning by the Republican conference.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a condensed version of a speech made by Joseph P. Kennedy before the University of Virginia Law School Forum several days ago as it appeared in the press.

Mrs. ST. GEORGE asked and was given permission to extend her remarks and include an article.

Mr. D'EWART asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include two resolutions.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. MANSFIELD (at the request of Mr. PRIEST) was given permission to extend his remarks and include a newspaper article.

Mr. WILLIS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article, notwithstanding the fact that it may exceed two pages of the RECORD.

Mr. SMATHERS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial appearing in the St. Petersburg Times.

Mr. MULTER (at the request of Mr. ADDONIZIO) was given permission to extend his remarks.

SECOND SUPPLEMENTARY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1951

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 9920) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 3193), which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TABER reserved all points of order on the bill.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9920) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, I should like to reach an agreement with the gentlemen from New York [Mr. TABER] as to time for general debate. It occurs to me that in view of the general approval of this bill on both sides of the aisle, we can get along with 2 hours of general debate.

Mr. TABER. I have felt that we really ought to have 3 hours. There is quite a good deal to the bill, and the Members will probably ask for very considerable explanations. I think not to exceed 3 hours would be about right.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 3 hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentlemen from New York and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlemen from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9920, with Mr. COOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, we are submitting the second supplemental appropriation bill for 1951. It is essentially a preparedness bill. It carries a total appropriation of $18,033,304,424, a reduction of $47,741,610 below the estimate of $18,081,046,034 submitted by the Bureau of the Budget.

The bill is principally for military preparedness, but a few items are included of an urgent nature for civilian purposes and it is largely from these that the small deduction has been made.

The amount provided in this bill for national defense will bring the aggregate amount provided for the armed services for the current fiscal year to a total of approximately $42,000,000,000. It will increase the over-all provisions for the fiscal year, in round figures, to $78,000,000,000. The total national income for the fiscal year is estimated to be between $41,000,000,000 and $42,000,000,000.

The amount we are now adding is for financing an immediate expansion of manpower and the stepping up of production, later to be augmented in step with developing needs and objectives. The details of the national defense portion of the bill will be supplied to you, to the extent that publicity limitations permit, by the able chairman of the subcommittee having jurisdiction of Defense Department appropriations, the Honorable GEORGE MAHON. Likewise, details will be supplied on other chapters of the bill by the several chairmen of the respective subcommittees having jurisdiction.

The funds here provided may be said to be the first increment of all-out preparedness for any eventuality. Other bills extending and expanding the program will follow as our Armed Forces and those of our allies develop production and mobilization for national defense. We have made some progress heretofore along these lines, hoping vainly, as it now appears, that somehow, in some way, the necessity for drastic action might be averted.

After Pearl Harbor the United States was a second-rate power. England had a much larger navy, France a much greater army, and Hitler, decisively, a much larger air force. When the war closed we had more ships, more tanks, and more planes than all the rest of the world combined. We were the mightiest military power, at the close of the hostilities in 1945 that history has ever known. Our descent from that commanding position was rapid and precipitous. The instant firing ceased Members of Congress were buried beneath an avalanche of letters and telegrams demanding, requesting that the boys be brought home. Industry wanted its employees back, mothers wanted their sons back, wives wanted their husbands back. There was a universal demand that the boys come home. It was insistent and peremptory.

"The war is over. There is no reason to keep them longer. They are needed here at home," and it seemed sensible and logical.

Military commanders and State Department diplomats pleaded for time for orderly demobilization. They pointed out the importance of completing negotiations and the necessity for maintaining occupation until treaties could be written. But importunities would not be denied and we brought them home. I recall that when the budget came up the Committee on Appropriations recommended and the Congress approved the elimination of $100,000,000 for maintenance of troops abroad in order to compel more rapid demobilization.

They flocked to transports so hurriedly and precipitately that they left war material scattered all over Europe and Asia. Some got back without rifles. "What use was a gun. We were not going to fight any more." There would never be another war in all the tides of time.

But other powers did not demobilize. Almost unnoticed they continued to draft and drill additional troops. Their factories worked feverishly in day and night shifts turning out war supplies. And as their diplomatic representatives become more aggressive and insolent we suddenly realize that while we turned our attention to peaceful pursuits they have more tanks, more guns, more planes, more submarines than we and our allies—that we have lost our position of military preeminence and it has been taken over by totalitarian government pledged to destroy free government and democratic institutions.

Belatedly we are beginning to look to our priming. But it is an uphill task. It involves vast expenditures. War was never cheap. It is estimated that when the cost of World War II is paid to the last pension, the total expenditures for all war purposes will reach at least $1,000,300,000,000. The cost of the next war will be infinitely more. The pay of a private is now almost four times what it was in that war. The cost of an antiaircraft gun has gone up from $10,000 to $300,000. A division which could then be financed for $14,000,000 now costs $74,000,000. And everything else in proportion.

Our course that does not take into consideration the agony and the suffering and the destitution? And it does not take into consideration the havoc which the next war will bring to America and her people and their possessions. In the last two world wars America was untouched. Not a brick was dislodged. Not a railroad rail was moved. Not a bridge blown up. But in the next war, however alert we are, however well prepared, some of the thousands of enemy planes will seep through and our centers of population and production, our shining cities will be reduced to rubble. It has happened to every other country. This time it will come to America. And no section, however remote, will escape. Even if we win the clock of civilization will be moved back 500 years.

We must not have another war. But how can it be avoided? We cannot retire to our own backyard to be isolated and surrounded and exterminated. We cannot run away. England tried that.

I sat in the gallery of the House of Commons and listened to Chamberlain. He had come back from Germany where he had traded everything he had and much more to Hitler for one moment's brief respite, and sometime afterward Hitler utterly destroyed the very building, the historic House of Parliament, in which we sat at that time.

The prophet Amos, over 2,000 years before, had foretold exactly what would happen:

> He that fleeth shall not flee away, and he that escapeth shall not be delivered.

We have only one alternative—to become so strong that no enemy will dare attack us. We must arm; we must arm as rapidly as we can; we must be as strong as possible as soon as possible, and this bill proposes a start in that direction. At the same time, the bill is not in a strict technical sense a war bill. We report it out today in the hope that by adopting this program, that by implementing these plans we can avoid war.

We labor under another heavy handicap. During the war we developed a spending psychology. And from 1945 down to date, instead of husbanding our resources as a bankrupt nation should have done, instead of reducing the public debt periodically and materially, we have spent for civilian purposes, for things which we could have done without, such vast sums that we are financially crippled today as we face the stern necessity of a war for survival. We could not deny ourselves. We adopted every new program. When the committee attempted to stem the tide on the floor we were outvoted on both sides of the aisle. We now have difficulty in refunding the bonds that are now outstanding. Month after month, when we made a drive to sell bonds, we found that more bonds had been cashed than had been sold. We face the necessity for the sternest economy. No money must be spent that is not actually and imperatively required either in this bill or those which follow.

We are fortunate in having General Marshall at the head of the Department of Defense; we are exceedingly fortunate that he continues hale and hearty under the added burdens placed upon him. With his great capacity, his wide experience, his patriotic devotion we can rest assured that no precaution will be overlooked and every step will be taken to insure the defense of the Nation. To his great wisdom and superior leadership go the lion's share of the credit for the direction and successful prosecution of the last war. We could not have been better captained and commanded. We placed our faith in him before and we place our faith in him again. And so far as I am concerned it will be the policy of the House Committee on Appropriations to follow his tried and proven leadership. To that end we invite the cooperation of every Member of this House regardless of party or other affiliation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 22 minutes.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I wish the gentleman would discuss what the procurement divisions of the Army and the Air Corps have done with the billions of dollars heretofore appropriated since Korea, so that we may find out if there is any negligence on the part of those agencies in getting the matériel which is necessary to arm our troops properly in order to carry on the war.

Mr. TABER. I will try to get to that to a certain extent as I go along.

Mr. Chairman, the State Department and the President have failed to protect the interests of the United States at Yalta, Potsdam, and in our dealings with the United Nations and China. The continuous appeasement of the Communist groups to the point where the threat of Communist domination of the world has become so apparent that even they could not avoid it has brought us to the most serious situation that I can recall in all the history of the United States.

We are faced with a situation where we must have many controls, many priorities and where the people of America must dig in and must cease to quibble about having a good time but work continuously, pay taxes and avoid the purchase of everything except absolute necessities all the time.

We have had presented to us appropriations involving close to 17 billions of dollars for the military. We must provide them. On the other hand, we must not provide for things that are not needed and that we can get along without. We need guns, ammunition, airplanes, tanks and ships and the men who will be required to man and operate them. We must have courage enough to tell folks back home that the military forces must have first call on everything, and that they must do without.

The Army must proceed in an orderly way and it cannot be allowed to waste this money by careless contracting and foolish and extravagant construction and operation.

We must expect just as much common sense in approaching this problem on the part of the Armed Services as we ask of the ordinary people.

When General Marshall tells us, as he has, that this is not the time to put universal military training into effect because it would absolutely interfere with and prevent the building up of our Armed Forces through the draft system which is already established, we must stop talking about that and get down to the things that are presently needed. If we need universal military training in the progress of events, that will be time enough to provide it. For my own part I shall be guided by what seems to be, for the time being, in the best interests of the military forces. That will be my aim as I go along.

The sacrifices that the people are asked to make are as nothing to what would hit them with Soviet control and Soviet domination over their lives. There must come on the part of the people a realization of the choice that faces them:

Slavery to a heartless and pitiless dictator like Stalin, or great sacrifices to preserve the liberties of mankind. And when those liberties are preserved this time, let us try to win the peace.

These estimates which relate to the dollars required for the military have been approved just as they were presented by the armed services.

They were approved in the amount of $51,000,000 for the Department of Defense, Office of the Secretary; $9,210,865,000 for the Department of the Army; $2,979,371,000 for the Navy; $4,603,011,000 for the Air Force.

This was all a cash appropriation. We have made enormous provisions for the Army for the construction of tanks. We have tried to supply, insofar as it might be possible, deficiencies in ammunition and munitions so that everything that is required, insofar as they are able to say that they can provide it, will be covered. There undoubtedly were a great many cases where individual items could have been cut without interfering with the efficiency of the armed services or the war effort, but there are so many other things that will have to be provided in the days to come, resulting from the turn of events in Korea and the more acute foreign situation, that it was impossible for us at this time to make the kind of a review that would permit us to pare down any of the items that were presented to us by the military.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Due to the fiscal policies of this administration there has been a spiral of inflation ever since 1945, as the gentleman knows. Is the gentleman able to tell the House how much of the cost of these various items aggregating about $16,000,000,000 is due to the inflation that we have had in the last few years?

Mr. TABER. Oh, I would say, taking in mind the whole picture—and I think we might just as well take in mind increases in compensation that have been given to the members of the Armed Forces and the allotments that have been provided, and all that sort of thing—that at least 30 percent of this $16,000,000,000 is due to the inflation that has been allowed to progress over the last 5 years. The whole bill calls for $17,820,000,000, as will be seen by referring to page 2 of the report. Six billion dollars of that, I have not the slightest doubt, is due to increases in prices and inflation.

The big items in this bill are, for the Army, $1,553,000,000 over-all for the Quartermaster Corps; $716,000,000 for increased personnel in the Army; $655,000,000 for the Signal Corps; $656,000,000 for the engineers; $4,000,000,000 for the Ordnance Department; and $575,000,000 for the provision of production facilities in the Army.

In the Navy the big items run as follows: For increased personnel, $184,000,000; for Marine Corps troops and facilities, $291,000,000; for Navy aircraft and related facilities, $158,000,000; for construction of aircraft, $156,000,000; for ships and facilities, $383,000,000; for construction of ships, $335,000,000; for Navy ordnance $707,000,000; for new public works, $303,000,000; and for the Navy's stock fund, $100,000,000.

For the Air Force there is provided for procurement of aircraft $2,114,000,000; for major procurement other than aircraft, $583,000,000; for acquisition and construction of real property, $807,000,000; for maintenance and operation, $704,000,000; for armed personnel, $264,000,000; and for research, $115,000,000. The total for the Air Force is $4,603,000,000.

I would say the percentage of build-up is perhaps greatest for the Army. There we are providing a force which at the end of the fiscal year on June 30 will be somewhere in the neighborhood of 1,250,000 men. Maybe they will go faster than that.

The committee has been guided unanimously, I would say, by this rule, that we should ask the military what they are able to use and then should try to provide it if it seems at all reasonable. It did not seem to be wise to the committee to provide a lot of things that they did not ask for or that they did not know whether they wanted or were not ready to order. We might all say without any difficulty that perhaps they will need much more than this, but until they can, in an orderly way, within their own organization tell you what they need and how to go after it, there is no reason for the committee to make provision. For my own part I am ready to let them have what they need. I recognize that we have not over a very considerable period taken advantage of many opportunities that we have had to produce real results. There has been a tremendous quantity of equipment turned over to the Chinese, which got into the hands of the Chinese Communists. On the other hand, most of that is not equipment which we could use today because it is not of the type of modern construction necessary today. Many of the things we had in the last war, like the Garand rifle and a few things of that sort, and most of the Navy ships are in shape so that they can be used. The aircraft, with the single exception of the B–29 which was in vogue at that time, is not of the most modern character. Frankly it staggers one when one sees what an airplane costs today because the cost is so terrific. It also staggers one when one sees what ordnance costs. Those figures are so high it is almost unbelievable. But just as I said before we are faced with the job of supplying these funds to cure the situation that the country finds itself in just as rapidly as we can supply them and just as freely as they may be asked for. We cannot, and we all might just as well recognize it, go into the kind of military production we would like to have. We cannot build up the personnel of the Armed Forces as fast as we would like, because there is a limit to the number that can be trained as we go along, but we have to do the best we can and take advantage of what our folks in our own Military Establishment can figure out can be used and produced.

Frankly, I have been disappointed in the situation in Korea. On the other hand, once in a while there is a glimmer of satisfaction. Such a glimmer came a couple of days ago when three or four of our jet planes went up against 24 of the Russian jet planes and cleaned them out. No country in the world has the capacity to produce that this country has, and that is because we have the free-enterprise system. We must preserve that system. We must expect it to do more than it has ever done before in the light of military production, and we must expect of the men who are called to service that same kind of superservice that has been given in the past, and which is the only thing which can today preserve the liberties of mankind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 35 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAHON], chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of Defense.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, if Members will pardon me I will not yield for questions until I have completed my remarks. The large charts which are before you will be of interest and I shall make reference to them and have them reproduced in the RECORD at the conclusion of my statement.

URGENCY OF PROGRAM FOR NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. Chairman, this is the hour which we had hoped could be averted. With the adoption of this appropriation bill we are coming closer than ever to the firm conclusion that full-scale war may possibly be upon us at any moment. It would seem certain that without a rapid build-up of our military strength all-out war would become inevitable. But with the military posture which this bill will help make possible, we still cling tenaciously and desperately to the hope that global war can be averted. Yet our hope is sustained by a very tenuous thread and with every passing day the danger looms larger.

Let us hope that Winston Churchill was right when he said in the House of Commons a few days ago, speaking with caution and reservation, that it was his hope and belief that the free world still had a breathing spell, still had time to build up its strength.

Obviously we do not know what the future holds. It may well be that the Soviets themselves do not know when and if they will launch an all-out shooting war against the free world.

The program to gain strength which we are now placing into operation, this present significant trend of events in the United States and in Western Europe, might conceivably cause the Soviets to change their timetable. But we cannot be deterred by that fact. We know that at this time, and during the coming months, there can be no possible security for us in weakness.

MILITARY FUNDS PROVIDED IN FISCAL YEAR 1951

I should like to proceed immediately to a discussion of the military portion of this supplemental appropriation bill. The question may well be asked, Why this supplemental request at this time? inasmuch as we passed a supplemental appropriation bill in August of this year giving the Army, Navy, and Air Force an additional supplemental sum of $11,000,000,000 for this fiscal year, bringing the total to twenty-five billion. Yet in the light of events the answer to that question seems obvious. It will be more profitable to discuss the way this supplemental request fits into the pattern of our defense effort.

Here is the picture as you will note from the chart which is now before you. For the current fiscal year—fiscal year 1951—we have already provided in the regular bill and in the first supplemental, as previously indicated, the sum of $25,000,000,000 for the Army, Navy and Air Force and for the office of the Secretary of Defense. In this supplemental request, $16,800,000,000 is superimposed upon the previous figure; and when this bill becomes the law, the Department of Defense will have available for the current fiscal year the total sum of $42,000,000,000. I am speaking in round figures in order to facilitate an over-all understanding of the sums involved.

The question arises, Is the $17,000,000,000 provided in this bill adequate for the present? The Joint Chiefs of Staff in preparing the supplemental request now before you were not restrained by an arbitrary ceiling figure which had been imposed at the White House. The Joint Chiefs were free to use their own judgment and to request those sums which they felt were required for the defense of the country. The committee was careful to advise officials that Congress stood ready and willing to provide any sum, regardless of size, which might be required for the defense and security of the United States. Defense officials stood solidly on the ground that $17,000,000,000 is all that should be requested of Congress by the Department at this time. The committee has adopted the program recommended by General Marshall, the Secretaries of Army, Navy, and Air Force and the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

However, let me point out that when the $17,000,000,000 figure was agreed upon by the Department of Defense, the full-scale attack of the Chinese Communists had not been made in Korea. In other words, the $17,000,000,000 requested is unrealistic in the sense that it does not fully take into account the losses which have been recently sustained in Korea and the changed world picture which has been brought about by the full-scale entry into the Korean War to the Chinese Communists.

Defense officials were asked if further funds were not required at this time. Their response was that it was not possible to calculate accurately at the moment what our recent losses had been in Korea and what might possibly be necessary in the light of changing world conditions. They explained that to resurvey the needs of the entire Military Establishment and to reestimate the requirements would probably require weeks. It would mean that this pending supplemental bill would have to be sidetracked and the program for further military buildup deferred until next session of Congress. Defense officials were unanimous in appealing to the committee to pass the bill which is now before you and await a further assessment of the situation and the request for additional appropriations until more information should become available. This, we were assured, would cause no loss of time in our defense program. In fact, the quick passage of the pending measure would buy much previous time which would otherwise be lost.

The Defense Establishment is now formulating its request for appropriations for the fiscal year which begins next July. That program, the program for the fiscal year 1952, should be submitted to Congress within a very few weeks and defense officials make it clear that the fiscal 1952 program is coordinated with the present request. It will provide for the extension and enlargement of the military program now in operation and to be placed in operation by the pending measure.

Now as to whether or not additional requests will be made for military appropriations for the current fiscal year, my own judgment is that additional requests will have to be made for further funds. Indications are that additional requests may be made during the early part of the next session within the range of 5 to 10 billion dollars. Of course, further requirements would be somewhat dependent upon the changing world picture. If full-scale war should develop, it is apparent that additional huge sums would immediately be required.

I have pointed out upon several past occasions a fact which all Americans should recognize—the fact that all-out mobilization of manpower and resources for a full-scale shooting war would require a minimum annual appropriation of at least $100,000,000,000.

Millions of men would be called into uniform and there would be an immediate increase in tempo. General Marshall, as you will note from the hearings, does not think it is in the best military interests of the United States for us at the moment to begin full and total mobilization for war of our manpower and industry. This view, insofar as I am able to learn, is held by the Joint Chiefs of Staff and by all our top military officials. They feel that this program is what should be carried out right now; that it comprises the efficient and orderly steps which should be taken at this moment. Members of Congress, in considering this measure, should consider it with all these factors in the background of their thinking.

I know that all of us are most anxious to do everything within our power to expedite our defense program and improve our military position. In other words, all of us fervently believe in an all-out effort. Obviously, the words "total mobilization" mean different things to different people. I believe all thoughtful Americans desire a total devotion to the job at hand. Certainly there is no disunity or lack of agreement on the necessity for the most effective military program that can possibly be devised for the prevention of all-out war.

To throw 5,000,000 additional men into uniform overnight in a full-scale military manpower effort without adequate weapons to train and fight with and without adequate training installations would in the opinion of most military men injure the defense effort, shock our production economy and rob defense plants of the manpower so vital to rapid conversion and expansion of defense industry and rapid production of defense weapons.

If full-scale war should break out tomorrow, there would be a disposition for all of us to ask the question, "Why did we not have 8,000,000 men in uniform and in the possession of all necessary equipment in order to meet the frightful demands of the moment?" On the other hand, if full-scale war did not break out, we would ask, "Why has the Department of Defense kept 8,000,000 men in uniform for all this time, disrupting families, bankrupting the country and upsetting the production and the economy of the Nation?"

It must be remembered that dollars alone will not buy security. There are other factors which cannot possibly be glossed over.

Let us take a look at military spending as contrasted with military appropriations by Congress. Congress appropriates the money but the money is expended, under our form of government, by the executive branch.

As I have said, when this bill becomes the law, we will have appropriated for defense this year $42,000,000,000. I am referring only to the figures for the Army, Navy, and Air Force. I am not including the $12,000,000,000 which we have provided for atomic energy, military aid to Europe and other programs which are strictly national defense in character.

If you include that, the figure runs up to $54,000,000,000 for national defense.

Of the $42,000,000,000 appropriated by Congress and available to the Department of Defense, only about $19,000,000,- 000, less than one-half, will actually be expended out of the Treasury this year. The remaining sums will no doubt be obligated during this fiscal year, and they are essential in order that obligations can be incurred and the programs placed under way, but the actual money will not be withdrawn from the Treasury and spent until a much later date.

It should be pointed out further that the Department of Defense has on hand from appropriations made in prior years, not including the current year, the sum of $8,000,000,000, mostly for aircraft procurement, which is available for expenditure. In explanation let me point out that a long lead time is required in the procurement of many highly technical and expensive items and they must be ordered months in advance of the date they can be delivered.

A look at our experiences in World War II might be profitable. I shall speak of fiscal years. In 1941 the Defense Establishment received appropriations in the sum of $14,000,000,000 and expended $6,000,000,000. In 1942 the appropriation was $94,000,000,000 and the expenditure was $23,000,000,000. In 1943 the appropriation was $66,000,000,000 and the expenditure was $63,000,000,000. In 1944 the appropriation was $87,000,000,000 and the expenditure was $76,000,000,000. In 1945 the appropriation was $44,000,000,000 and the expenditure $41,000,000,000. The disparity between the appropriation and expenditure figures in World War II is accounted for by the same factors previously explained which apply to the current fiscal year.

It would seem from a comparison of World War II and current figures that we are going a considerable distance toward full mobilization. In other words, we are now entering a state of partial mobilization on a very firm basis which will increasingly become capable of rapid expansion to all-out production and mobilization. Regardless of moneys appropriated, the country will move forward on the basis of certain inevitable and inescapable limitations. What we seek is maximum effort and maximum performance.

In comparing present figures with World War II figures it should be borne in mind also that the defense dollar now will buy perhaps two-thirds to one-half of what it would buy during World War II hostilities.

PROCUREMENT PROBLEM

At this point it would be profitable to take a look at the procurement problem. It is perfectly clear that the Government must immediately and by compulsory means do a better job of channeling essential defense materials away from the manufacturer of ordinary civilian goods and into the hands of the manufacturer of defense items. Take the communications and electronics field. Manufacturers are doing a huge business in civilian production of such items as television sets. They are making large profits and they are not too excited about giving up civilian production and converting to defense production. Communications equipment has increased in price from one-fourth to one-half since the Korean fighting began and prices in this field have about doubled since World War II. This fiscal year we are providing the Army Signal Service with about $1,000,000,000 and the Navy and the Air Force are receiving a total for such purposes of about $2,000,000,000.

The point of this whole matter is that all manufactured items, airplanes, tanks, trucks, guns, and ammunition have vastly increased in price and are moving upward in cost every month. Production for nonessential civilian purposes must be drastically reduced, the pressure must be relieved, and American industry must proceed full speed ahead in defense production or we are not going to get our money's worth for the defense dollar and our rearmament effort will bog down. Of course, we do not discount the difficulties involved in the conversion program.

IMPACT ON THE ECONOMY

Previous appropriation bills since the hostilities of World War II ceased have had relatively little impact on the civilian economy. The bill before us today will start a chain of reaction which will have a terrific impact on American industry, and on our civilian economy. In this bill $8,000,000,000 is for major procurement, tanks, airplanes, guns, and other items of hardware. Out of the $42,000,000,000 provided for the Army, Navy, and Air Force for the fiscal year nearly $19,000,000,000 is for major procurement. In other words, and in a big way, we are coming into the hardware stage of our defense effort. Plans cannot be forever left on the drawing board while research and development people seek for the perfect weapon. At such a time as this we must have something in hand—much more than we now have—with which to fight. And let us hope that we may have time for the buildup and that our buildup may be a stabilizing influence which will swing the scales in the direction of peace.

ITEMS IN THE BILL

Now a few quick references to some of the provisions in the bill. It accelerates the antitank and antisubmarine program, so important to the defense of this country. It provides additional funds for the all-important radar fence.

It provides large additional funds for research and development in the field of guided missiles, and puts guided missiles in actual production for use by the services.

Additional funds for research and development are provided, bringing the over-all total for the year to $1,100,000,000.

It provides for a buildup of the United States Air Force from 58 groups to 68 groups, and paves the way for the 84-group program in the next fiscal year. This action upholds and vindicates those of us in the House who have worked for years for a more powerful air force.

Additional aircraft for the Navy is not provided in this measure in view of previous appropriations for this purpose, but additional ships will be taken out of moth balls, and the funds provided will insure more modern ships and a greater degree of readiness. The Navy will have 1,028 active ships in service.

Tanks in quantity are provided and other Army weapons through an over-all $4,300,000,000 provision for such purposes.

Under this measure the number of men in the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marines on June 30 would be 2,766,000, distributed as follows: Army, 1,264,000; Navy, 684,000; Marines, 166,000; Air Force, 651,000. However, plans now being worked out will raise all these figures to higher levels and this is clearly required.

The bill provides the Army, with $9,200,000,000 when added to previous appropriations this year, runs the over-all total to $16,500,000,000. For the Navy the corresponding figures would be three billions and ten and eight-tenths billions; for the Air Force four and six-tenths billions, and thirteen and seven-tenths billions.

MILITARY SECURITY

The printed hearings of the military portion of the bill are more sketchy than ever before. In the hearings this year and in previous years we have urged officials to keep out of the record all information which would be helpful to the enemy and dangerous to the security of the United States. Yet we recognize that some information must necessarily be made available to Members of the House and the American people.

Here is what often happens. During our closed-door hearings the military people speak in guarded tones when they refer to information which would be helpful to the enemy, the record is carefully edited, and then a few days or weeks thereafter this hush-hush information, part or all of it, appears in the front page of the paper with the intimation, usually false, that it is an announcement from the Pentagon. This policy is inexcusable. It endangers American lives and the security of the United States. It tells the potential foe what our program is and informs him how to plan. This dangerous blabmouth procedure has already cost lives and dollars but during the succeeding months of our accelerated military program it might have more tragic and disastrous results. I again, as upon previous occasions, make a plea for the security of the United States in these matters.

The top officials in the Military Establishment are greatly concerned when there are leaks of information. It is to be hoped that at this critical time they may prevent further helpful announcements to the potential foe. It is likewise to be hoped that all other public officials, and American citizens generally, will also be more careful in these important matters. It is conceivable that the release of secret information might mean the difference between peace and war, victory and defeat.

CONCLUSION

We all recognize that this is a dangerous world and that from day to day we are in grave peril, but I feel some well-intentioned Americans are unwittingly broadcasting to the world some very dangerous statements. Those who rush into print to say that we are in worse shape than we were the day after Pearl Harbor, those who proclaim that we have nothing to fight with and no defense plans in the event all-out war should strike tomorrow, those who shout from the housetops that we stand naked and defenseless before the world and intimate that the aggressor could bend us to his will in the event of war, those who say that the American people are frustrated, bewildered, and disunited—those who say things like that should weigh their words carefully lest they perhaps convince the aggressor that the free world is ripe for aggression and is waiting only to be plucked. Such untimely declarations when made without reference to other factors might possibly tend to incite the aggressor to full-scale attack. Yet we recognize that a balance in these matters must be found as it is urgently necessary that the American people be frankly informed of the dangers which confront us.

In World War I and in World War II, the aggressor attacked because he underestimated the might of America. The aggressor would probably never start a war which he did not think he could win. For my part, I am not going to encourage him to start one by giving him the hope that we would fall over and play dead and permit him to win it. If the worst comes to the worst, America through blood, sweat, and tears and frightful losses, I admit—but America would triumph again.

Now is the time to set the record straight. We hate war; we love peace and liberty; we do not want to fight. We are not prepared to wage all-out war at the moment. We do not propose to start a war, and we have no aggressive designs on any nation. If a full-scale war should start tomorrow we would be pushed back on many fronts. We would be critical because we did not have 10,000,000 trained men in uniform, with 5,000,000 of them in Western Europe; we would bemoan the fact that we did not have enough tanks and airplanes, and that much of our mighty fleet was still in mothballs; our losses would be great, and we would be humiliated wherever we would have to retreat; we would lose some battles and some campaigns. But we would have some men in uniform, some tanks, some airplanes, some ships, some ammunition, some atomic bombs, and the power and the will to deliver them upon those who had brought havoc to the world. We would have the greatest industrial and agricultural potential the world has ever known, the greatest reservoir of skilled labor and know-how the world has ever known, the greatest steel and oil production and capacity on the planet, the very sinews of war; and immeasurable capacity for united effort and an undaunted fighting spirit which is born again with every generation.

No, no, we are not ready for war—far from it—but I hope a recitation of a few fundamental truths will tend to set things in their proper perspective and warn the aggressor lest he be deceived by loose talk and miscalculate the will and the actual and potential might of the United States.

In conclusion, as a united and determined people, let us get on with the job of building up our defenses as effectively and as rapidly as possible. The time may be shorter than we think. Not 1 hour should be wasted. And as we devote our whole energies to the task of self-preservation and peace we can pray every day for the best while we rapidly prepare for the worst. The quick passage of the bill now before us is a significant part of the job at hand.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. FORD. Can the gentleman state whether the item for construction of ships amounting to $335,330,000-plus contains funds for the completion or the initiation of the so-called giant aircraft carriers?

Mr. MAHON. No. We have provided for about 18 additional minesweepers, and for accelerating the work on our submarines and our killer-type submarines, and on the reconversion of ships like the Essex, now being reconverted at a cost of $32,000,000 and many other programs. This carrier, which you speak of, is in the mill, a large carrier, but not as big as the one previously canceled. But the Navy is moving along in a very splendid way in its program. Of course the new carrier is in the cards, unless some change unknown to the committee is made.

Mr. FORD. What they anticipate is a reactivation of the ships of the class of the Essex and Independence?

Mr. MAHON. Not only that, but what is more important, they are being reconverted and made capable of carrying the heavier jet type of plane.

Mr. SADLAK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. I yield.

Mr. SADLAK. My question was along the line of the question asked by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD]. I thought the gentleman said in his statement that there was no additional provision for planes for the naval branch of the service, but simultaneously he said that more ships were being taken out of "mothballs."

Mr. MAHON. That is right. Earlier in the year we provided large sums to the Navy for the aircraft program. Admiral Sherman did not request at this time any additional aircraft for the Navy. Further requests will come next year. Many undelivered naval aircraft are in process of manufacture for the Navy.

The Air Force has available today $8,000,000,000 with which to pay for undelivered aircraft. The Navy does not have as big a program, but the Navy program is considerable. The Navy is in good hands and is growing in strength on the sea and in the air.

Mr. SADLAK. My question came because the gentleman was saying that more ships would be taken out of mothballs.

Mr. MAHON. Yes; and the airplanes have already been ordered to accommodate those ships.

Mr. SADLAK. There has already been provision for additional carriers, which would be taken out of mothballs?

Mr. MAHON. Yes. You have to order these airplanes a couple of years in advance.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAHON. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I would like to ask if this chart, which calls for about $17,000,000,000, is for carrying on the program that we have now.

Mr. MAHON. It is for carrying on and expanding the program which we now have. It is for laying the groundwork of the program which could rapidly be expanded for the defense of the country.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Could the gentleman tell me how much of this goes into actual war effort?

Mr. MAHON. If the gentleman will look at the third column of figures, he will see "Procurement of tanks, ships, guided missiles," and all those things. There is provided $18,800,000,000 for that purpose in the current fiscal year. Eight billion in the bill pending before us is for procurement. During the previous years we have had to pay our men and feed them and clothe them and transport them and maintain and operate ships, aircraft, and so forth. The largest single portion of the money, percentagewise, had gone for that purpose prior to the Korean action.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if this money we have been appropriating for the last 4 years has been entirely for upkeep of the Army, the Navy, and Air Force.

Mr. MAHON. No. The membership should not be confused or upset by the fact that since World War II, and prior to this year, we had appropriated $50,000,000,000 for national defense. Twenty billion dollars has gone to pay, feed, clothe, and transport the Armed Forces. I do not know of anybody who did not want to pay, feed, and clothe our forces. About $13,000,000,000 has gone for maintenance of these operations. Heaven knows we realize now that we should have spent the money to maintain and operate our defense program.

Eight billion dollars went for such things as procurement of combat weapons and those expenditures are paying dividends now, and in the future they will pay much larger dividends. Two billion dollars of the money went for research and development which kept us ahead of the world in the matter of military research and development and in the modernization of weapons. So we have nothing to apologize for with respect to where the money has gone. Some of us wish only that more had been provided in view of the situation which confronts us today.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MAHON. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I am only trying to do something to help out my country. As the gentleman must realize——

Mr. MAHON. I do not speak in impatience of the gentleman from Massachusetts; I speak with some impatience of the lack of understanding on the part of some of our people, not including my fellow House Members, as to where the money has gone. If we had disbanded the Army, Navy, and Air Force and taken the $50,000,000,000 and spent it for tanks, airplanes, and other fighting weapons with nobody to man them or care for them, placing them in warehouses or out in the weather where they would deteriorate and become obsolete, the critics would of course have ample basis to complain. Rusted, obsolete weapons and no men in uniform to man them would really place us in a perilous position. All we need is more light and information on what we have been trying to do. The gentleman has been cooperating in doing what he could as a Member of the House for the defense of the country and I commend him. A speech I made on August 25, 1950, and which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD fully covers this subject.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MAHON. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLSON. I agree 100 percent with what the gentleman from Texas has said. I want my country to be armed 100 percent. All I want to know is whether this money is going for our own protection or for somebody else.

Mr. MAHON. All this money is for the defense of the United States, and I am sure we are unanimous in supporting this request. An expensive rearmament program is unavoidable, yet it is far and away the greatest tragedy in our time that in a world where so much needs to be done for the uplifting and betterment of mankind we should be compelled to give our best resources and our finest energies to the horrible demands of war.

I wish to insert at this point for reproduction in the RECORD the two charts to which I have referred and yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, the future of America, the future of the Western World, depends in the last analysis upon military power. Given sufficient military power it may be unnecessary to use it. Without sufficient military power America cannot speak or act effectively, under present conditions. Military power offers the best hope of avoiding war and carries with it the best assurance of dealing effectively with the enemy in the event of war.

Five years ago, Mr. Chairman, America had military power in abundance. We had defeated all of our enemies. We were the most powerful military nation in the world's history. We were in a position to assure almost any peace that seemed just and lasting.

That opportunity, Mr. Chairman, was literally thrown away. Unconditional surrender; decisions at Tehran, Yalta, and Potsdam; the dismantling of fighting forces and equipment; and the dismal failure of our Far Eastern policy have all contributed.

Today, despite $19,000,000,000 worth of weapons and equipment supposedly in our possession at the end of World War II; despite $144,000,000,000 heretofore appropriated in the fiscal years 1946 to 1951, inclusive, for national defense and related activities, we are confronted by a picture calling for immediate action.

We know that our great reserve of military power is not adequately mobilized; that there has been little or no mobilization by our allies; that the administration still declines to accept aid from the Chinese Nationalists; and that the Communist Government in Soviet Russia, controlling directly or indirectly one-fifth of the world's surface and one-third of mankind, today, according to highest authority, has no less than 175 divisions under arms, one-third mechanized; with some 40,000 tanks, some 19,000 planes and several hundred submarines.

Mr. Chairman, surely the aims of the Communist Government in Russia must be clear to all by this time. The teachings of Lenin, avowed frequently by Stalin, 36 broken promises during a period of 12 years, 45 vetoes, aggression through satellites and general conduct at the United Nations, must have convinced any who heretofore have had any doubts.

The dangers of inaction or lack of effective action in America, Mr. Chairman, must be equally clear to all. We must prepare. National preparedness is called for and called for immediately.

We were unprepared, Mr. Chairman, prior to World War I. We were unprepared prior to World War II. We were unprepared prior to Korea. It must not happen again.

The recent record of the administration is not encouraging.

I have not personally read the report of the Johnson committee in the Senate, but I am told that it states flatly that the defense agencies have been lagging behind the public in awareness of the emergency, and that it charges specifically inefficiency, negligence, lack of coordination and, above all, complacency, in such important agencies as the Munitions Board, the General Services Administration, and the National Production Authority.

We know, Mr. Chairman, that over $700,000,000 provided on two occasions by this Congress for an expanded air force were in each instance impounded by the President and not allowed to be spent.

We know that $22,000,000 similarly provided by the Congress for Air Force research and development were impounded in the same manner. The hardship resulting from this action is referred to specifically in the hearings.

We know that at the end of the last fiscal year more than $1,700,000 provided by this Congress for national defense purposes and subject to obligation or expenditure during that fiscal year had not been obligated as of its close on June 30, 1950.

Mr. Chairman, I have listened day after day to almost every word of the testimony in connection with this bill and I want to emphasize that we were told specifically and repeatedly that the requests now under consideration do not represent a war budget or a full mobilization budget. On the contrary they represent, and I quote, "an initial step in a planned 4-year effort to give us some measure of security against disaster."

Mr. Chairman, it is clear from the off-the-record if not from the on-the-record testimony before your committee that vital items in the pending appropriations were estimated for back in the autumn before the recent developments in Korea and that they are entirely inadequate.

It is evident that the whole program now under consideration is based on a time element assumption which may prove as false as the assumptions made in respect to the North Koreans and the Communist Chinese in Korea.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, the program before us today in important respects is too little and too slow.

Mr. Chairman, the record of the past is history; the record of the present and the immediate future is in our hands.

The emergency confronting America at this time calls for realistic and speedy action. The time element is vital. We must achieve a level of preparedness essential for the security and defense of America at the earliest possible moment. We must prepare, despite the enormous drain on our economy and the possible effects upon our standards of living.

As the Chancelor of Germany recently said, "There will be lasting peace only when the United States is able to confront the Soviet Union with a military force, to attack which the Russians would consider truly dangerous. Only then will the time have come to talk peace, lasting peace, with the Russians."

Mr. Chairman, there is no time to lose.

As has been pointed out, the bill before us carries the enormous total of $17,820,000,000.

The greater portion, or $16,844,000,000, goes to the three armed services, bringing their over-all total for the present fiscal year up to $41,841,000,000.

Of this total the Army will receive $16,400,000,000, the Navy $10,700,000,000, and the Air Force $13,800,000,000.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I include at this point in the RECORD four tables giving over-all break-downs for appropriations during the fiscal year 1951:

The Army request is based on 1,263,000 enlisted men, 105,000 officers, and 526,000 civilians; 16 divisions, if you please, or only one division more than those which we now have under arms.

The Navy request is based on 688,000 officers and enlisted men, 424,000 civilians, and a moderate increase in ship production, conversion, and acceleration.

The Air Force request is based on 651,000 officers and enlisted men and some 250,000 civilians, with the exception of 68 wings by the end of the present fiscal year and 84 wings during the following months.

You will notice from the tables inserted in the RECORD, that ordnance and expediting construction account for about 50 percent of the request by the Army; that ordnance, ships and facilities, both ship and air, account for some 60 percent of the request by the Navy; and that aircraft and other procurement account for about 50 percent of the request by the Air Force.

Mr. Chairman, the request under consideration is an enormous one. It has been impossible to consider the various items in detail because of the time available. The presentation by the services has been rapid. The consideration by your subcommittee has been rapid.

As appears from a table which I shall insert at this point in the RECORD, as of November 30 last, only 52 percent of the sums previously made available to the services had been obligated, and only 17 percent of the total had been expended. This of course suggests the possibility of postponement and further consideration of certain items at a subsequent date.

It should also be noted that many of the items have been computed on a new mathematical basis called scoop. This almost defies analysis.

There are undoubtedly items in this bill which are too heavy and which may not be justified. There are undoubtedly other items that should receive further consideration. I have in mind particularly the requests of the Army Quartermaster Corps and the requests for construction items by all three defense services.

I repeat, however, that items of major importance in this request, items which are fundamental to the over-all programs of all three services, are clearly insufficient. Further, requests in the near future appear to be imperative.

In view of the vital importance of time, knowing that there will be further opportunity for review as further requests are presented to your committee, I support the national defense items in this bill and urge the administration to accelerate the mobilization program at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield to my able colleague from Massachusetts.

Mr. NICHOLSON. In this program are we taking care of a 70-group air force?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. The present program contemplates proceeding from 58 wings to 68 wings in the present fiscal year, and from there to 84 wings in the course of the next year.

Mr. NICHOLSON. If that is so, have we taken care of the Air Force for which we voted in the Eightieth Congress?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I do not know how I can answer the gentleman any more specifically than to repeat what I have said, that at the present time we have some 58 wings, that we are proposing to increase to 68 wings in the next 6 months and to 84 wings in the course of the succeeding year.

Mr. NICHOLSON. If we pass this appropriation bill, if we do all these things, can the President then say, "We do not need it"? That is all I want to know.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. The President always has the power to impound appropriations.

Mr. NICHOLSON. My friend from Massachusetts, with whom I agree almost all the time, must realize that we voted in the Eightieth Congress to have a 70-group Air Force, and the President would not permit it. Is he going to permit it now?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I tried to emphasize that in my opening remarks. I certainly hope with my friend from Massachusetts that there will be no repetition of the procedure to which he refers.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Can the gentleman advise whether or not in the amount provided for the Army there is an item for military defense assistance program, and if so, how much is it?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. The gentleman refers to the overseas program?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. As far as I know there is nothing specifically provided here for that program. Those funds are taken out of appropriations already made, as I understand it.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. What is being done for the Navy regarding the carriers and the naval air arm?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I think there is nothing specifically here for naval aircraft, but there is considerable for other items in which I think the gentlewoman is interested.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does that mean another carrier?

Mr. TABER. Carriers would come under ships. There are $335,000,000 for additional new ship construction.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. What is a ship? What is the definition of a ship?

Mr. TABER. It might be a carrier, or it might be a destroyer, or minesweeper, or a battleship.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman know whether that carrier which was authorized and on which there was a cut-back will be built now?

Mr. TABER. I do not understand that it will, but I understand that another carrier of very substantial size will be in process.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Some of the Army have stated that the carriers are very much needed in this Korean situation and that it would have been a rather different story if we had had those carriers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TOWE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWE. Mr. Chairman, I intend to vote for this bill. However, I am not convinced that this large sum of money is to be spent in a manner which will give us the defense we so badly need. The Congress has already appropriated many billions of dollars, yet we are now told by Secretary Marshall that the police action in Korea has bled us white of materials and men. What is the plan? What is our policy? I ask again, where are we going? How can we be assured that this $18,000,000,000 will bolster our defense? It now appears that no matter how many billions we spend we cannot get any assurance that the countries who are receiving material assistance from us either can or will fight when the chips are down. The time has come to devote all our energies toward defending ourselves. Perhaps if we start now we can defend the Western Hemisphere. In this connection I invite your attention to a speech made by former Ambassador Kennedy. What he says begins to make sense to me.

I understand that the President this very day will declare a national emergency. The administration talks of total mobilization, yet only this morning we read that Secretary Marshall advises against total mobilization.

While the administration is trying to make up its mind what its policy is abroad and at home, our men are fighting and dying. That is a terrific sacrifice, made largely because those who have directed our foreign policy have not known what they were doing.

On the home front many substantial businesses, from which workers earn their living, and from which the Government secures great tax revenue, will be put out of business unless there is some definite plan adopted immediately. In many instances manufacturers and others are unable to get material and at the same time defense orders are not available. All of this results from the fact that this administration does not seem to know what it is doing.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SHEPPARD].

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, in the time that has been allocated to me I am not going to be able to discuss some of the intricate portions of the bill. However, I can say to you that this bill has been closely scrutinized by the combined membership of your committee, the regular subcommittee which ordinarily has cognizance of these appropriations was joined by the members of the Deficiency Appropriations Committee and also the members of the so-called central committee.

So the conclusions reached and presented to you here today are not those exclusively of the subcommittee ordinarily handling appropriations of this character. You have heard very fine explanations of the details and particular items of the bill from those who preceded me, however, I would like to call your attention to something which I think is significant, and which will have something to do with your thinking on the subject in the future. The present bill which calls for $16,800,000,000 is of course an estimated and splendid program, although very belatedly presented to the Congress. Now listen to this: Developing from the first regular appropriation bill and the first supplemental bill there is, as nearly as I can establish at the moment, some $10,000,000,000 that have not yet been obligated or expended by the military. When you take the $10,000,000,000 in that category, and if this bill is passed, which I am sure it will be, and add to this $16,800,000,000, you have a total of $26,800,000,000 as the result. During the course of the hearings I addressed inquiries to the present inflated cost of procurement as related to dollars provided by our appropriation bills and the appropriations contemplated by this bill. From information furnished to me by the Procurement Division and those in authority and supervising the work of the Department of Defense, it is very definitely indicated that because of lack of controls in this country our present dollar has declined in its procurement value at least 20 percent, if not more. I think as much as 28 percent, but let us use 20 percent.

Consequently I would like to call to your attention as forcibly as I can that you must not anticipate that the moneys we have appropriated are going to buy dollar wise what a dollar normally would buy unless you have a controlled economy, if the present standards of procurement and the inflated position of the dollar prevails during the time required to make the future procurements. You are going to lose at least 20 percent of the value of the dollar, which is a very low estimate, but will at this rate amount to $5,300,000,000 of dollar buying loss. Do not forget this when regulations for control are requested.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. In that $10,000,000,000 which the gentleman mentioned a moment ago as having been brought forward from other bills, does that include money which was not expended for the purpose of purchasing aircraft for the Air Force?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That includes any and all of the money that has not been expended and all that is left in the category as unexpended.

Mr. HINSHAW. In other words, that is the money that was impounded, which was to purchase the additional airplanes?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not necessarily. Not in my mathematics. The impounding to which the gentleman refers had to do with the 70-group aircraft program and does not include this money. I am referring specifically to the money appropriated in the last regular bill and the first supplementary bill, on which my information is there is approximately $10,000,000,000 unexpended or unobligated. So you add that to what we presently have under consideration, and it would make $28,000,000,000 plus, which would be subject to the slip-off of 20 percent. This result would make a total of about $3,300,000,000 loss.

Mr. HINSHAW. If the gentleman does not have the breakdown, perhaps the gentleman could put it in the RECORD.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In order to do that I would have to call back all the procurement officers and ask them what particular amounts were left out of respective categories of expenditure, to wit, planes and various and sundry others. This could not be done in time for this RECORD.

Mr. HINSHAW. But there has been a withholding of these funds from commitment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I cannot accept your statement literally. I will say that the money you refer to has either not been obligated or expended for the cause it was intended by the Congress and at the time.

Mr. HINSHAW. I recall the words of the gentleman's committee in the report on the appropriation bill last spring.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. BROOKS. I know the gentleman's concern, as is mine, is that we get this defense program moving at top speed at the first possible moment and that we turn out the airplanes, tanks, ammunition, and equipment that we so badly need as rapidly as is possible. That leads me to this question: Is there any major request for appropriation by the defense departments which was turned down by your committee?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not one.

Mr. BROOKS. This bill represents substantially everything that the Defense Department needs at the present time?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is exactly right, insofar as their testimony before the committee is concerned.

If you want to get expeditious consideration of your dollar expended, there is one way, and that is to have an immediate declaration of emergency and put everybody to work, instead of just a few of them in Korea.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. SHEPPARD] has again expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCRIVNER].

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Chairman, although I may be repeating some statements already made, I cannot impress too deeply upon the Members of the House the fact that this presentation is not a realistic or factual presentation. You must understand that the machinery that it takes to get all of these estimates up in detail requires time. Each service determines its needs. The Joint Chiefs of Staff review the requests. Those agreed upon go to the Bureau of the Budget. If there approved, it goes to the President, and in turn the request comes to Congress. These figures were developed by the Armed Forces on the facts as they existed prior to Thanksgiving Day and prior to the terrific setbacks and losses that we have since experienced in Korea. As a matter of fact, in many of the categories of supplies which were requested, there were some of us who felt that possibly we should urge upon the Armed Forces to accept a larger sum of money. We did make that suggestion, but we were met with the reply that this was an orderly process and to do otherwise would break up the orderly plan. Certainly if the set-backs in Korea had not busted up an orderly plan, nothing else has. This is not a realistic presentation. Our military leaders assured us that our needs are being reviewed daily and that they will make their further needs known at the earliest possible moment. That simply means, I am sure, that immediately upon the convening of the Eighty-second Congress there will come to this House and to the Senate requests for far more funds, based in part, at least, on our Korean experiences to make available to the men in our services many more supplies.

Essentially this bill will give the pay that is necessary for the augmented Armed Forces. It will give us more ships, more planes, more guns, more ammunition, more bombs, all to be used by this added increment of men.

Another situation that should be realized by the Members of the House is that there is a change in procedure in this budget. For many years past when contracts ran for many months we gave to the Armed Forces what is known as contract authorization. In other words, they were authorized to enter into contracts and then later on the money would actually be appropriated to pay what had become due upon these contracts. Under this particular budget presentation, you will find there is no contract authorization, but we appropriate for the entire program, no matter what was the length of the program, whether it be a 10-day program, a 10-month program, or longer. The entire cost of the program as it is now envisaged by the present prevailing prices is provided for. There is no provision made for the anticipated rise in the cost of materials and labor. All of those things must be adjusted at a later date.

Many of the facts were given to us off the record, and properly so. Frankly, I have stood aghast at some of the disclosures of facts made here relative to our military program, not only here on the floor of the House but in the hearings and in the reports. You will recall that last spring when the defense appropriation item was up I suggested that perhaps it might be a good plan to have executive sessions of the House and the Senate when we discussed these war measures, because we were telling altogether too much about what we were going to do; so much so that a potential enemy need not have a very costly spy system to find out all our secrets. All any enemy would have to do would be to have his agents sit in the gallery of the House while we were discussing the bill, read the RECORD, and read the reports and hearings, and they would know exactly what we had in mind and what we planned to do. Even though many details are not in the hearings and many details are not in the report, that does not mean that the members of this subcommittee do not know what the major essential facts and items are; we do. To a great extent due to the lack of time for detailed examination, we have had to accept the advice and recommendations of our military leaders upon faith; you in turn must take some of our statements on faith, because we cannot and indeed we should not disclose all the facts upon which this budget presentation and appropriation is based. It is distressing that this must be so. We would like, all of us on the committee would like, to have had many more detailed facts, but time did not permit. We would like for you to have more and more facts, but the world situation is so serious that it is not proper or expedient or wise to give those facts on this floor. Many facts can be given in private, if desired.

As far as present needs are concerned it may be helpful to know that with each passing day more and more of the carriers of every type that were in "mothballs" on both coasts are being restored to service just as rapidly as the crews can be obtained and just as rapidly as the machinery can be tuned up ready to go. That is true of many particular types of our naval vessels. We can be entirely thankful for a program set up and approved by this Congress to conserve these ships in the event of another outbreak which we hoped would never take place until long after those ships had turned to rust. The event has taken place, we have them available and they are being made ready rapidly. Many of those ships that were in the "mothball" fleet are today doing duty in Korean waters.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCRIVNER. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am very glad to learn that because I think it is very helpful for this country to know that and also the other countries of the world to realize that fact. The gentleman may remember that when we were on a committee there was always an appropriation for what we called lots and slabs for added necessities. I feel that the armed services still has those appropriations that have been made available without talking publicly about them to go ahead with our defense.

Mr. SCRIVNER. In closing, Mr. Chairman, may I say that the time has come when we must face the facts. This Nation must prepare and be strong, this Nation must pay for that program and while we are doing all that we must pray that our preparedness plans are timely—and that these men and munitions will never be needed in any war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PICKETT].

Mr. PICKETT. Mr. Chairman, researchers have estimated the average era of peace in the history of the world to be but 7 years. Events of the last two generations reduce that average. We are not at peace now; but while we strive for peace, we must prepare for war. Uncertainty, indecision, delay must end.

To recount the errors of omission and commission of the past would serve no useful purpose. They must not be forgotten. We must draw on them for experience and use that experience as the compass by which we chart a clear, direct, and positive course.

We have lost an unwanted fight in Korea. In the words of one Army sergeant, "We weren't exactly beat. We were just fighting a lost cause against too damn many Chinese." Many thousands of our soldiers are now being evacuated from northeast Korea. Admittedly, we cannot reinforce the remainder in substantial numbers at this time. It would probably be the better part of wisdom to evacuate them all.

Because of our experience, the action we are taking in passing this supplemental military appropriations bill should be used as another step in a preparedness program far greater than that we have undertaken since World War II. We must increased our Armed Forces as rapidly as practicable by the integration of volunteers, draftees, reservists, and the National Guard; providing the manpower with the best possible training, leadership, and weapons.

In order to support such a program for preparedness, we must mobilize our civilian manpower and industrial production. Legislation already passed by Congress to achieve that end ought to be utilized since it is evident the voluntary-compliance efforts of the past are not successful. If the law is inadequate, Congress will amend it.

Such an economic mobilization will require controls and allocations that I personally dislike and would not support in ordinary times. But these are not ordinary times. It will require increased taxes and reduced production of civilian goods. It will require the paring of Government expenditures for programs not essential to our survival to the bone. Politics, controversial domestic issues, "business as usual," must take a back seat.

In the process of mobilization, while continuing to work for peace, we must assess the world situation in the light of who is our friend and who is not. Those who give a clear indication that they choose to fight on the side of freedom will be aided in keeping with our own preparations and our ability to aid them. Assistance to those who are not our friends should not be extended.

These observations do not touch all of the problems we are faced with. They are not intended to do so. I believe those things at least are necessary in view of the challenge confronting us. Answer to the challenge by a direct and positive course will be immediately responded to with determination and cooperation by the American people.

We have all prayed such a course would not be necessary; but it is far better to be prepared for the worst and it not occur, than to be unprepared should the worst come.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY].

Mr. GARY. Mr. Chairman, I shall take just a few moments to explain one or two items in this bill which were considered by the Subcommittee on the Treasury and Post Office Departments. The Post Office had no request for additional appropriations at this time, but the Treasury did have several. The first was a request from the Division of Disbursements, which appears on page 5 of the bill, for $380,000. These funds are to take care of an increased workload arising out of the social-security-extension bill, which was passed after the enactment of the regular appropriations bill, and also to take care of the expenses incident to the issuance of checks in payment of a second special dividend on national service life insurance. The committee approved $300,000 instead of the $380,000 requested.

The Bureau of Customs requested $350,000 to take care of the increased workload at the ports of entry. They need some additional help. The committee did not feel, however, that they need all of the help requested, so we reduced their request to $225,000.

The Secret Service asked for $82,000 additional for special agents and $49,000 for White House Police for the protection of the lives of the President and the Vice President. After the recent attempt on the life of the President and in view of certain other information that was presented to the committee, we thought the additional protection should be provided and approved the full amount requested.

The other item is both substantial and important. It increases the operating expenses of the Coast Guard $18,600,000, and the funds for acquisition, construction, and improvement, $7,900,000. Those funds are to be used entirely in the port-security program. You will recall that when the first supplemental appropriation bill was before us the port-security program had not been perfected. Therefore, the Coast Guard was not in a position to request a specific appropriation. We did, however, in that bill authorize them to use not exceeding $10,000,000 of their regular appropriations for port security. The program is now beginning to take shape, and the Coast Guard requested these funds to finance it. Realizing the necessity of protecting our ports from atomic bombs and other explosives, the committee approved the entire amount requested.

That covers all of the requests of the Treasury Department.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CANFIELD].

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, as the ranking Republican Member of the House Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments, I concur in the statement just made by our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY]. I hope that the membership will find time to read the hearings on the presentation of the Chief of the United States Secret Service, Mr. Baughman, when he discussed the protection of the President and the Vice President. You will note in the bill before you today that we are not only providing funds for the protection of the Vice President but we are also providing for the first time legal authority for such protection. You will see, if you read the hearings, where I examined the Chief of the United States Secret Service at some length regarding the protection of the President when he appears in the House of Representatives to make a presentation on the State of the Union or otherwise before a joint session of the Congress. It is my considered feeling we do not have adequate measures for proper protection of the President when we hold such meetings, and, furthermore, that we do not have adequate protection for ourselves.

One of the mistakes of World War II was the administration's delay in facing up to inflation controls.

We do not want to see that experience repeated.

The first consideration, to my mind is—are we to be engaged in an all-out rearmament effort? Apparently not.

This country has not entered a stage that could be described as a war economy.

Back in 1942 half the Nation's entire income went for defense purposes. At the present time, while our national income is running well above $230,000,000,000, current expenditures for the Army, Navy, and the Air Force are at a rate of not much more than two billion dollars a month. That makes our defense effort roughly 11 percent as compared with 50 percent back in 1942.

I think that it is time we realized that we cannot regard our rearmament program as something to be carried out at half speed. Rather we should work at top speed—and that will mean controls and sacrifices I feel the American people, in return for safety and protection, are willing to meet the challenge if they are convinced that no time and no resources are being wasted to drive ahead with this new defense effort.

Now, there is another phase to defense here in our United States. It is civilian defense of our American cities and towns located in so-called target areas. I shudder when I think of how remiss we have been on this problem of civilian defense, when I hark back to the time that month after month our President permitted the United States National Security Resources Board, charged with jurisdiction over civilian defense, to go without a permanent Chairman. True, after the very able and distinguished W. Stuart Symington was named as head of that important body he started feverishly to work out a program of civilian defense, and now there is a new agency charged with carrying out this effort. But even at this moment we have no national law on this subject.

May I say to you in passing that only this week when we in the House of Representatives preponderantly voted to give Tito and the communistic Government of Yugoslavia $38,000,000 we also refused in the very bill before us today every cent requested by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for civilian defense of our National Capital city, almost $400,000. Not 1 cent was allowed by the subcommittee. Not 1 cent appears in this bill before you. Of course, the members of the subcommittee will say to you that they had some doubts about the request.

Do you recall the speakers who advocated the grant to Tito and his Government? Almost every one said, "I have extreme doubt about this grant. I am holding my nose when I vote 'aye' on the bill." I voted "No."

I live in a target area. My cities of Paterson, Passaic, and Clifton, N. J., on the fringe of New York, are in a prime so-called target area in this atom-bomb world. Do you know what some of my mayors are telling me? "Mr. Congressman, we are waiting for the cue from the Federal Government. We are waiting to see what the Federal Government is going to do in the way of laws and appropriations before we legislate, before we appropriate any funds for civilian defense."

Do you know what I am telling my mayors? I am telling them, "Mayors, you may wait too late if you wait for the cue from the Federal Government. Mayors, you know as well as I know that the first law of life, the first law of nature, is self-preservation. You now have a weighty responsibility. You ought to get on the ball."

Only today I picked up from the New York Times this little item about air-raid surveys in Great Britain. They are not waiting. They know that time is of the essence.

LONDON, December 14.—The Government has asked local authorities for a survey within 2 months of their existing air-raid shelters and estimates of additional shelters needed.

Where are the shelters in the District of Columbia? Where are the shelters in our Capital City today?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to compliment the gentleman on mentioning civil defense. The same sentiment that was echoed to him in New Jersey came to me from every single city manager in my district. They want to know what the Federal Government is doing. They want to know their cue. They want to get ideas as to what they should try to do. I gave them the same answer the gentleman gave his mayors, that they had better start themselves because a delay might be fatal if they did not do anything about it, if they waited to hear from the Federal Government.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the distinguished gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman may remember that the governors and mayors of various States and cities came to Washington recently and asked for guidance and help. They went back without any definite information to give to their people. If the gentleman reads the press, he knows that is true.

Mr. CANFIELD. Yes; that is true. They went back confused. There is no question about it. And we here are so unrealistic in facing the facts of life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SIKES].

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, the gravity of the present situation has been emphasized so repeatedly that there can be no question of the dangers which confront us. Time may indeed be running out on us. We have little choice but to be as well prepared as we can for any eventuality.

When we pass this bill, we in Congress will have done all that we can in defense preparations at this time.

It provides for an over-all build-up which more nearly approximates a war footing than any measure brought to you since World War II. It materially increases and modernizes our fighting strength.

It does so at terrific cost, considerably more than on June 25, more than double that of a comparative build-up in 1940. In a sense it ignores the lessons of Korea, for Korea is primarily a land war. Specialized ground combat units could be equipped and trained for land fighting at much less cost. This measure looks beyond the fighting in Korea and prepares us for defense in a broader sense. We have no alternative but to prepare to defend ourselves on land and sea and in the air. We do not know where the next attack will come.

A stronger defense will not come overnight. We cannot go home and say the passage of this bill has made us secure. This is a money bill and it takes time to convert it into armed strength. But we can say we have provided what the services need from us. As a matter of fact the services have not spent all the money previously voted for them. Now we simply are signing a check to permit a continuation of the build-up which we recognized as essential in September, and which we find must be increased in keeping with the increased gravity of events world-wide.

This is a $16,000,000,000 build-up, and the committee is unanimous in support of it. Obviously, the committee has not had time to thoroughly examine the justification offered in this request for funds. It is the best estimate we can make under the circumstances. We are placing a very great trust in the heads of the Armed Forces. Fortunately they are men in whom we can place great trust.

Historically, defense funds have become almost sacred in this country. I do not think that is a wholesome situation. Virtually anything can now be justified and secured in the name of defense. We in Congress lean over backward in our desire to provide for the security of the Nation and the comfort and well-being of its forces. That can lead to abuse. It can and possibly does lead to gadgeteering. An increasingly larger number of men is being required to operate the supply lines and the equipment which support our men at the front. In consequence I believe we today have in our Armed Forces a smaller percentage of men with guns in their hands than any other nation. Our men are better armed, and they are better provided for. That is pleasing and what we want. But these things do not necessarily provide the balance of victory. Witness Korea, where Reds with one pocket full of rice and another pocket full of ammunition whipped us soundly.

We can now more clearly evaluate the seeming disaster to our military forces in Korea. We have in truth lost a campaign. But we have not lost a war. Our forces were badly hurt but they were not destroyed. There remains strong UN fighting forces which have formed a defense line across the narrow waste of Korea which is fully capable of taking care of itself.

We need not delude ourselves on the possibility of winning in Korea for a long time. We do not have the resources at this time and our allies are not providing the additional forces which are needed. I doubt that we could justify the cost in manpower if we had the resources. We can hold on until we see fit to evacuate and we can do both successfully.

I hope the lesson in Korea has taught us we can never afford to become involved in a land war with China. Now that Red China has thrown down the gauntlet however, we can and should afford the Chinese Nationalists an opportunity to bomb Red commerce, railroad lines, and military factories. We should systematically encourage Nationalist guerrilla activities inside China. We will find Red China highly vulnerable, and we can develop sufficient confusion and unrest inside China proper to lessen her appetite for pulling Russian chestnuts out of the fire in Korea, Tibet, southeastern Asia, and finally, India.

These are not costly undertakings. They do not require the sacrificing of American lives. They simply encourage the Chinese to fight for a government of their own choice.

The most alarming sign of the times is our seeming inability to prevent the enemies of world freedom from picking the time and place where trouble starts. This, coupled with our willingness to attempt to handle the trouble almost alone, presents a situation where we can be bled to death, physically and materially. This, more than to fight us, is the first aim of the Kremlin. It is not necessary that we fight on our enemy's terms. Nor is it possible that we fight successfully alone. These truths we must accept.

I state again: the Chinese Nationalists offer a fertile source of manpower on Formosa. The Nationalists and the anti-Reds on the mainland of China offer many more. We ignore both. The Japanese offer trained men, 5,000,000 of them, and a tremendous industrial potential. Theirs is the biggest unused source of military strength in the world today. We help to feed the Japanese. We protect them. We neither ask nor get anything in return. To utilize their strength will require no new policy. We have demonstrated that we are not squeamish about whose help we get. I do not consider Japanese hands any redder than Tito's. And the Japs were our friends for many years before their war lords prostituted their thinking.

These forces, singly or jointly, can give our foes much more to handle in Asia than will be required to get their attention off us. And to those who are sticklers for legal form, I suggest the use of "volunteers," as other powers use them, and a treaty of peace with Japan, which is wholly within our right.

There are in Europe hundreds of thousands of refugees from communism. They will fight and fight well for a chance to go home again. Surely they have as much to fight for as the American boys who are now being prepared to fight in Europe if we are attacked on that continent.

Communism does not hesitate to use whatever weapons are at hand. With all its disregard for human life, the Kremlin is not today expending Russian lives. We live in a world which is wholly practical and not at all idealistic. We shall have to be practical too. We may save many American lives if we rely more upon allies who, because of their background, know much better than we how to deal with Communists.

But these things are not within congressional jurisdiction. We are the legislative, not the administrative branch of government. Ours is the responsibility of providing the funds and the basic laws, of trying to follow through as the people back home would want.

There is in this bill funds which will nearly double our fighting effectiveness and provide us with modern weapons. That, I think, is the comparison in which you are most interested. I believe the security of our Nation requires this step which we now propose.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, we are here this afternoon about to bill the taxpayers of the United States for another $18,000,000,000. It does not make any difference in what language you speak, that is a vast amount of money and the people are entitled to know what commitments this spending is designed to implement and whether they are going to get dollar for dollar.

In other words, are those who have been enriching themselves on defense spending going to continue their luxurious ride at the expense of the security of this Nation?

President Truman, in his message to Congress on December 1, in connection with this legislation, had this to say and I quote:

> About $9,000,000,000 of these new funds will be used for major military procurement, and to expand facilities for military production.

Let it be remembered that in four fiscal years, after the end of World War II, more than $50,000,000,000 was supposedly spent on the Military Establishment of this country, yet when the blow fell in Korea it became apparent that only about eight and one-half billion dollars of this staggering expenditure actually went into the weapons of war and the trained forces necessary for their efficient use.

In the light of this extravagance, which must be charged to President Truman and his administration, are we supposed to believe now that we will get more in the way of actual defense for less than eighteen billion than we did for more than $50,000,000,000?

On the basis of dollar for dollar we are going to get less if for no other reason than that President Truman, by refusing to put price and wage controls in effect long ago, has permitted inflation to debauch the medium of exchange and rip wide holes in the Nation's economy. As to the price of inflation, according to the latest report of the Council of Economic Advisers, United States citizens are now able to save, percentagewise, less than half the amount they saved at the first of this year—3.1 percent compared with 7.6 percent. How much more suffering, under scarcities and black markets, can small manufacturers and their laid-off employees stand? In this connection, the previously mentioned Council of Economic Advisers reports that unemployment increased 300,000 in November, the last month tabulated, over October.

This Congress, long ago, provided President Truman with the powers to halt inflation, distribute materials equitably, stamp out black markets, and stop the gouging, but he has procrastinated. Why? Apparently he is not interested in the people we represent, but we should be, and I, for one, am.

Under Truman inflation, how much will the proposed appropriation be worth when spent next week, next month, or even tomorrow? What will it buy for our fighting men? And who will reap the profits, and to what extent?

Are we content to saddle the people with another $18,000,000,000 mortgage while closing our eyes to profiteering and inflation?

Nobody denies that it is necessary to build our military strength. But how can we do it, no matter how much is spent, if the purchasing power of money vanishes into the thin air of inflation or into the bottomless pockets of the profiteers?

The people of this country are bewildered, confused, and becoming desperate because of the stupidity, blundering, and procrastination that has been perpetrated upon them. At no time in the history of this Republic, in a time of crisis, have they suffered more from a lack of firm, intelligent, and courageous leadership.

The people of this country are fast coming to realize that their internal danger is becoming grave. They labor under no illusions as to their external danger. They have long since become convinced that they are at war even though there are some who still indulge in the pettifoggery of calling it a police action.

I do not know what the present occupant of the White House proposes to say in his message to the Nation this evening. I do know that under the Constitution and his oath of office he has the duty and the obligation to set forth, and where he has the authority, to put into effect those measures necessary to end the present chaos and provide the unity of purpose the people want and which is so desperately needed.

If unable or incompetent to meet the needs and demands of the hour, President Truman should resign forthwith and make way for someone who can meet this challenge.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the proposed appropriation for armaments.

Armaments per se have always meant nothing; armaments are merely the implementation of a policy. Armaments implementing a policy of genuine defense of a people's interest is one thing; armaments implementation in pursuance of a genuine defense policy is always in the interest of the Nation, but these armaments implement an insane war program which has never been in the interest of the Nation and it is today definitely not in the best interest or defense of the people of the United States.

This insane war policy culminated last June in our operation desperation in Korea. I do not believe I am subjecting myself to an accusation of immodesty when I now say beyond challenge that I stood up here as the only Member of this House in opposition to our intervention in civil war in Korea. I did so on the very day on which the President announced our disastrous adventure in Korea. I said then, on June 27, in the well of the House, after the majority leader had read the statement that the President had issued from the White House:

> Mr. Chairman, we have heard words read here by our distinguished majority leader which I think will mark a disastrous course, and the words I am using do not adequately describe the disastrous consequences this course will have on the people of the United States unless checked by the people themselves.

That was said on June 27. Events since June 27, I maintain, have vindicated the position I took at that time. There are very few people in America today who do not wish we had never gone into Korea. I said also at that time that the Chinese people would fight; and I explained that our action there was not in the defense of a single American interest in Korea, but that we were fighting against the national aspirations of the people of China, Korea, Viet Nam, and other peoples in Asia for national liberation and self-determination.

Now you here offer what? More appropriations for more armaments, leading to what? Leading to the acceptance of an increased armaments race and of the doctrine of the inevitability of war. Some Members have stood up here during this debate today and have stated that we were at war. The idea of the inevitability of war is being foisted on the people largely by those who sit in the high seats of government. That idea has been fostered here. Tonight it will be fostered again by the President of the United States in his address to the people of the country.

The only alternative that is offered to the people of the world and the only alternative that is offered to the people of the country as a result of this insane war policy which you are implementing with this appropriation is world conflict and use of the atomic bomb. This is the tragic end of the road on which you have been dragging the American people.

I stated also on June 27 in connection with the atomic bomb:

> Remember one thing: A bomb was dropped on Hiroshima. It had terrible consequences, but it did not frighten the people of China and it did not frighten the people of Korea and the people of Asia.

So the threat of the use of the atomic bomb has only alienated decent-minded people away from us. Events show that that threat has not frightened the people of China. The alternative of the use of the atomic bomb, the alternative of an armaments race, the alternative of the idea of inevitability of war, leave us completely bankrupt in the eyes of our own people here at home whose economic and social interests are being sacrificed every day to the interests of this insane war policy, to this armaments program, to the interests of this doctrine of inevitability of war. I say again what I have said since June 27 that there is no interest in Korea of the American people which warrants the shedding of one precious drop of American blood, there is no interest there of the American people which warrants the disastrous consequences which have been inflicted on our soldiers, on our economy, and on the welfare of the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one additional minute.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, the best defense of these United States is not armaments, the best defense of these United States is a policy of peace. I say that our problems can be resolved without the sacrifice of a single interest of the American people; they can be resolved by a policy of courageously carrying out two steps—cease fire on both sides and at the same time honest negotiations for an honest conclusion for peace. But you cannot enter into those honest negotiations unless you recognize the right of the Chinese people to self-determination and the right of the people of China to national unity. We must accept the people of Asia and China as equals. You cannot enter into any honest negotiations for peace as long as you want to hang on to a corrupt dictator like Chiang Kai-shek and insist on establishing false, unjustified, and pretended defense lines for America in Formosa or in other parts of Asia. That will not make for an honest and effective conclusion for peace. That only carries out the insane program of war and despair abroad and at home.

The best defense of America does not lie in this armaments race implementing this insane program of war. Such a race will lead only to a war which at best no one will win, but which will destroy civilization as we know it. The best defense of America does not lie in the atom bomb. It can be thrown in both directions and destroy us, too. The best defense of America lies in a policy of peace and today specifically the best defense of America is peace with China.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] had to say just now. While Korea may be a terrible mistake, I do not think the gentleman from New York offers us a prescription to cure it. This bill, in my opinion, is about the best step we can take to overcome the situation caused by our reverses in Korea.

I wanted to say something else which does not directly concern this bill. Anyone reading this bill might get the idea that America is a warlike nation, that we were, by building armaments and through other war preparation activities, provoking people and nations into war. The few remarks I wish to make are that for an undeviated history of 50 years the considered policies of the United States have been peaceful. I wish to place in the record a few landmarks indicating conclusively that we are seeking peace for ourselves and the world.

In 1901 we entered into a treaty under the leadership of John Hay enunciating the open-door policy for China by which we virtually guaranteed the territorial integrity of that country.

In 1922, I think it was, after we had gone through World War I, we had a naval disarmament conference, inviting the leading naval nations to participate, which they did. Many people have laughed at that effort, ridiculed it, and made fun of what we proposed. In my humble judgment it indicated the heart and mind of a country that was groping and trying to find a way to make peace. Much as that disarmament conference was criticized at the time, I want to point out to you that very few, if any, statesmen in the United States Senate voted against that disarmament proposed by the conference, by which we proposed to and did sink the most tonnage. Considered in the light of the conditions following the war of 1917, it was a magnificent gesture in what we thought at the time was a step toward world peace.

Then we went along for a few years. We were still trying to find some way to avoid warfare among the nations of the world. In 1928 we sponsored the Kellogg-Briand Pact. Unfortunately the fine expressions and the noble principles set out in that document had nothing behind them to implement it. It laid down the basic principle that war would be the last resort of nations to settle disputes. It laid down the policy that every single effort in every direction, and by every means, to bring about the settlement of disputes between nations should be by negotiation and other peaceful methods. There was nothing in there, however, to implement any decision arrived at, nor was there machinery to force negotiations before going to war. The result was when that treaty might have been invoked at the outbreak of the world war, some of the signatory parties disregarded it. They plunged into war, disregarding the path provided by the Kellogg-Briand Pact, to which they were a party.

Then, what did we do in 1946? We kept a promise of almost 50 years with the Philippine Islands that when they were ready for their freedom we would give it to them. We won the war of 1898 and got the Philippines. Only 2 percent of the people of the Philippines could then read and write. We educated them, we trained them, we poured in billions and billions of dollars to help them educate their people, develop their economy, and get ready for self-government, and finally in 1946—and I think this is one of the greatest steps ever taken by a great nation—we finally gave them their freedom. On top of that we made an agreement to last 25 years to help stabilize their economy and get on a firm, sound economic basis. Some of us are wondering if that was a mistake, but any way it shows that we had no imperialistic designs, which some prominent people and nations are accusing us of having.

We furnished the leadership for the writing of the United Nations constitution. I do not think that that document is as well written as the original document of the League of Nations, but, anyway, it showed the considered judgment of our Nation and most of those who were in control of the conference to find peaceful methods to settle international problems.

Later on we were worried about atomic warfare and the Baruch plan was offered by the United States, which I think was almost too liberal for our own security, but it did lay down a realistic plan of inspection that I believe would have had the effect of outlawing atomic warfare. It was rejected by one of our allies.

We have done other things during the past half century that any unbiased reader, any unbiased historian or student of history, must interpret as being that fundamentally and basically the United States of America does not want war. We want to get along with the world. We want the world to solve its problems by some type of united security and some type of negotiation, but in every one of our efforts we have been thwarted.

I hope and I pray, like you do, that what we are doing today in stepping up our defense $19,000,000,000, and what we will do next January in stepping that up probably a great deal more than that, will not lead us into a general war whereby everybody will lose, even the winner. I merely, in my humble way, want to get down in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, for those who may read it, that we have this long record of effort in trying to bring about a peaceful world. We can truthfully say the United States has been a leader of the efforts, even though they have all been abortive up to date, to bring about world peace, for which the people of the world have dreamed and prayed and worked for over 2,000 years. This by no means is all the efforts we have made to provide world peace.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does not the gentleman feel that industrial production will be very much stepped up under the leadership of Mr. Charles E. Wilson, the president of the General Electric Co.?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not believe you could pick a better man in the whole United States than Mr. Wilson to handle that problem. He is a well-trained, statesmanlike industrialist. He will do an excellent job.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE].

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to seek time to speak at this time, but because of certain testimony given by our national defense leaders and also because of some utterances in debate today, I do desire now to express a few sincere opinions.

I am not one who thinks it would be a great service to the men in the Kremlin for our people to know and recognize the extent of the danger, the gravity of the peril to freedom not only all over the world but right here in our own country. Perhaps the men plotting that peril know its scope and extent better than I. Suffice it to say that in my opinion the danger is far more grave than at the time of Pearl Harbor, for the reasons that then we had powerful allies who had their strength mobilized and were already in the fight. Today we do not have an ally whose strength is mobilized. Moreover, our own strength is mostly unmobilized. Yet we face the organized and mobilized might of a large part of the land mass, the resources, and the human masses of Eurasia.

What disturbs me by a reading of the testimony of the national defense leaders before the Appropriations Committee and by some statements which have been made here is an apparent hesitation to make an all-out approach to what clearly appears to be an all-out danger. If this hesitation is born of a feeling that an all-out attempt at defense preparation on the part of our country would precipitate further acts of aggression by our acknowledged foes, I would recall to you that those arguments were uttered repeatedly in the Congress of the United States before Pearl Harbor. "Oh, we dare not build up an air force or fortify this or that lest we precipitate war," it was said. Mr. Chairman, let us not repeat the mistake.

If that hesitation arises out of some lack of confidence in the willingness of the American people to face up to the dangers confronting their country once they know and recognize those dangers, then I must say I do not share that lack of faith.

If that hesitation is based upon an apprehension that the people of the United States could not contain themselves in the event of a diminution of a Communist threat after our strength is fully mobilized, that full mobilization would make war inevitable even though the threat to freedom shall have lessened, then I must deny that democracy and freedom is untrustworthy with power, can only be safe and trusted as a handmaiden of weakness.

If that hesitation is based upon a real fear for what may happen to our way of life because of years of governmental controls, restrictions, regulations, taxes, inflation, and all that these mean, then I must say that I share the apprehension fully. Many dangers to freedom are involved, internally, I mean.

But, Mr. Chairman, the threat from aggressive communism with its mobilized military hordes is stark and immediate. This growing menace has already snuffed out the liberty and democratic character of a whole series of nations. We must prepare fully and immediately to repel this threat, taking our chances with acknowledged attendant dangers.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the able gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am sure the gentleman well knows the high respect I have for him and his patriotism and intelligence. I do not understand the gentleman to be criticizing the Congress for its failure to build up the national defense of this country, do I?

Mr. GORE. That was not the purpose of the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I hope the gentleman will permit me at this point in his remarks to call the attention of the people to the fact that the Congress of the United States on three different occasions did vote to increase our air force from 48 groups to 70 groups, and that that increase which the Congress provided for never came about until after the attack in Korea. I think I should point out the Congress of the United States did provide for armed forces totaling over 2,000,000 men, and yet in spite of that fact our armed forces numbered slightly over 1,400,000 men at the time of the attack in Korea. I hope there will be no inference drawn from the gentleman's remarks—and I am sure the gentleman did not mean it that way—that the Congress of the United States has been dilatory in its duties. The responsibility for the failure of the American people and the American Nation to be prepared at this time rests squarely with the executive branch of the Government and not the Congress. We have voted every dollar that has ever been requested for national defense purposes.

Mr. GORE. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Ohio for his contribution.

In reply I would be pleased to advise him that it was not my purpose in rising to be critical of anyone, let alone to be critical of the Congress of the United States. Of course, there is blame enough for all of us. There is blame enough for both parties in the Congress. I have no desire to be partisan now. There is job enough for all of us—every member of both parties, not only in the Congress, but every official in our Government and every citizen of America. It is not my purpose to be hypercritical, realizing that in these terrible times officials of the executive branch no less than ourselves are under terrific strain and pressure. Instead, it is my purpose to voice some deeply disturbing thoughts that I have.

In calling to the attention of this body what appears to me to be a great, grave threat to the very existence of our country, and my doubts about the adequacy of our measures to vouchsafe our security, I do not predict doom for my country or read its obituary. I desire to arouse and exhort my Government and my fellow-countrymen to recognize the danger for what it is and to prepare to safeguard our Nation.

Our basic fault with a partial mobilization effort is that it doesn't get the necessary job done, it being very hard to obtain sacrifice from one unless sacrifices are required of all.

Let me address my remarks now to one part of this bill which comes from my subcommittee dealing with the Atomic Energy Commission. There you will find one instance in which an all-out attempt is being made. Not only are we appropriating enormous sums by this bill to build additional fissionable-material-production facilities, but, as has been announced in the press today, there is money contained in the bill for the construction of plants in other countries to make available a greater supply of uranium so that there may be in the hands of our country in the future a continuing supremacy of atomic weapons. Were it not for the superiority we have in atomic stockpiles, I fear that we might be faced with an imminent threat in Alaska, if we are not under present circumstances. We can be thankful for this atomic-weapon headstart. We must keep it. Other preponderances stand in our favor—a superior navy, a qualitatively superior air force, productive capacity, and a virulent, free people.

Mr. Chairman, for these reasons and others, I urge a policy, not of overcautiousness—deliberateness, yes; but not overcautiousness—rather a policy of imagination and courage, faith in the people, faith in our institutions, and faith in the cause for which I fear we are bound to fight.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, that concludes the general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

FEDERAL SECURITY AGENCY

OFFICE OF EDUCATION

Promotion and further development of vocational education

Appropriations made under this head for the fiscal year 1951 shall be available for carrying out the provisions of the act of March 18, 1950 (Public Law 462).

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FOGARTY: On page 8, after line 12, insert:

"PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

"For an additional amount for National Institute of Health, operating expenses, $2,625,000, including the objects specified under this head in the Federal Security Agency Appropriation Act, 1951."

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Chairman, events of the past week leave no doubt that our country must be fully prepared for all-out war. We must be equipped to wage an offensive attack in remote areas and be alert to the likelihood of battle close to or at our shores. In addition, we have to recognize the immediate necessity for strengthening the civilian backbone which experience has taught us is the mainstay of our war effort.

For both military and civil defense, health and medical advances are of the utmost importance. In the last war—a war which unfortunately has only been recessed—we were able to succeed in combat and maintain production largely through the application of scientific and technical knowledge amassed beforehand and given impetus during the emergency period. These lessons must not be lost.

We are engaged in a struggle in which we are at a tremendous numerical disadvantage. We can counter or offset this situation only by technical and scientific superiority. In health and medical services both for military and civilian standards, we are short-handed. We cannot afford also to be short-sighted.

As we all know and have recognized through enactment of the doctor draft, medical manpower is one of the weakest links in our chain of armor. Shortage, not only of doctors, but of technicians, nurses, and other specialists, has brought us perilously close to the stage where we cannot be certain of sustaining our health and strength. The most important factor in this picture is research and research manpower.

Trained personnel cannot be obtained overnight and cannot be obtained even in a period of years. We can and must take the next step of expanding research and scientific endeavor so as to multiply the capacity and increase the ability of each doctor and nurse. Through discovery of disease cures and drugs, application of research findings, improvement of clinical and patient care and rehabilitation of the ill and injured, we can increase manyfold the quality and quantity of medical service, even though we cannot hope to increase medical manpower to the point of minimum adequacy.

Above all, we must emphasize research in the basic sciences. The source and origin of power and potential in this area are the universities, medical schools, and research centers of our Nation. From these alone can we hope to get the flow of discoveries and men which will be the mainstay of the medical effort. From this potent resource we have only recently obtained the miraculous discoveries of cortisone, the much publicized drug which has proved potent in a wide array of diseases, and findings concerning blood composition, fractions, and preservation, which may revolutionize treatment of patients suffering from shock and burns.

I appreciate the vast recent appropriations to the military, some of which will be applied to medical research, but the armed forces must properly, and of necessity, concern themselves mainly with the application of research findings, development of methods, and care of casualties. The research which they support bears directly and immediately upon performance of their military function. In order to make this research and care more effective, precisely the type of work which I have described as emanating from the schools and research foundations is of greatest significance. Without constant delving and searching in fundamental problems of physical and mental disease, we cannot hope to provide the knowledge and material indispensable to the medical functions essential in military and civil defense. We can go only so far in maintaining our healthy individuals and caring for our sick on the basis of present knowledge. Expansion of research presents unlimited prospects in maintaining an economy of high production and in assuring strong military forces.

Despite these considerations, the House Appropriations Committee deleted a request for the relatively small sum of $2,600,000 for basic research authorized under the recently enacted medical research law. Public Law 692, approved August 15, 1950, authorizes specific support of research and training in arthritis and rheumatism, multiple sclerosis, cerebral palsy, epilepsy, poliomyelitis, blindness, leprosy, and other diseases. The law also directs the Surgeon General to establish in the Public Health Service a National Institute of Arthritis and Metabolic Diseases and a National Institute of Neurological Diseases and Blindness. Passage of the research legislation in August at the time of significant military and civil-defense preparations and following the decisions to cut back or defer nonessential programs, clearly implied recognition of its importance for the national welfare and security. The nature and extent of the diseases and disabilities to which this new legislation directs action manifestly indicate their close relationship to the mobilization effort and heightened civilian production.

Shortly after enactment the Senate approved a $3,000,000 appropriation for this work, but this action was not confirmed by the conference committee. Despite this set-back, the Surgeon General proceeded in recognition of the urgency of these programs. He promptly established the institutes and has convened the advisory councils of outstanding non-Government experts which are prescribed by law to review and approve specific projects. The councils have already begun work on the assumption that programs approved by Congress would receive financial support.

In addition to the military and civil-defense considerations, it is important to realize the background which led to passage of this law. It is estimated that some 7,000,000 people, or about 5 percent of the population, suffer from arthritis and rheumatism, costing the Nation about $750,000,000 a year in lost wages, relief payments, and medical care. Hay fever and asthma affect some 3,400,000 Americans; goiter and thyroid diseases afflict 1,200,000 people; and diabetes incapacitates another million; at least 330,000 suffer from peptic ulcers. Many of these are among the physical handicaps building up the alarming rate of military rejections.

Among the neurological diseases, the situation is comparable, if not worse, since these afflictions distort mind and body and have not yet been completely accepted by the public as health problems. Those who suffer from cerebral palsy number more than 500,000; epilepsy affects over 800,000 and multiple sclerosis destroys bodily control of 175,000 more. Tragic blindness handicaps 200,000. For these, adjustments to normal living is trying and difficult. The economic costs to the Nation arising from these diseases—not considering the pain involved—run into billions of dollars, whereas the sums so far spent for research on causes and means of prevention and cure are negligible.

These statistics, striking though they may be, do not completely define the real issue. That basic issue is one of extending hope and measures of relief and possible cure to millions who will find the courage and strength to man our guns and to support those who do. Of greater importance are the possibilities held out by research in the prevention of disability and disease.

The National Institutes of Health, research organization of the Public Health Service, has developed plans for conduct of the basic investigations authorized. Financial support is the sole important factor now holding up commencement of work.

Mr. Chairman, this Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce passed this legislation by a unanimous vote. Congress passed this legislation last August authorizing the setting up of these two new institutes by a unanimous vote. It was too late at the time this bill was sent to the Senate for justifications to be presented to the subcommittee of which I am chairman. As a consequence the Public Health Service justified these expenditures before the Senate Committee on Appropriations. The Senate allowed an expenditure of $3,000,000.

Because of the fact no one from our subcommittee served as a conferee the $3,000,000 Senate item was stricken out in the conference.

All I am asking the House to do this afternoon is to include in this supplemental or deficiency appropriation bill a sum of $2,625,000 so that these two institutes which have already been authorized and set up by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service can start in operation this fiscal year. The only way we can start these two institutes operating is to give them money with which to operate between now and the first of July 1951. I know that the Bureau of the Budget has already allowed a budget request for these two institutes for the next fiscal year, but because of the fact that they have already allotted the sum of $3,000,000 that has been provided by the Senate and because we as Members of this body have not before had an opportunity to vote on whether or not they should have any money with which to operate, I think it is only fair and just that the Congress have a chance today to vote to put these two institutes in operation for the benefit of millions of people in this country at the present time.

In all of my work in the Congress and in the past 10 years since I have been a Member of this body, I do not know of any other governmental organization that has worked in a more cooperative spirit with private agencies and with the American Medical Association as has the various institutes on heart, cancer, and mental health. We all know of the success that has been obtained by those institutes over the past 5 or 6 years since they have been operating with funds appropriated by the Congress in that time.

All I want to do is to grant some relief to these millions of people, because we believe that the answer is in sight. We know by actual experience through development, through research and discovery of two what we have been told by leading doctors in the country are perhaps the greatest medical discovery since Pasteur's work on bacteriology. I refer to the two wonder drugs, cortisone and ACTH. For the first time in history men and women who have been afflicted over the years and have been bedridden by rheumatoid arthritis and other forms of arthritis after a few injections of these wonder drugs are up walking around at the present time and are resuming the work that they had previously engaged in 4 or 5 years ago.

I know this from actual experience. We have a clinic that just started in Rhode Island. I saw a man there only 2 weeks ago who was a former railroad worker, who had been bedridden for 5 years. After treatment with this wonder drug, cortisone, for 2 months, he has resumed his work as a railway worker. If this can be accomplished for that individual and the millions of people who are suffering and laid up and bedridden at the present time, it is not only the responsibility of the Congress but, in my opinion, we would be fair and just to them due to the possibilities now through the discovery of these great drugs. They will not only relieve pain but will put men and women back on their feet who have been bedridden for years.

This is an opportunity for the Members of the Congress to do something not only for the war effort but for the millions who are suffering from this disease at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Rhode Island has expired.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes, one-half of the time to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOGARTY. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CANFIELD. The gentleman from Rhode Island sponsors a great humanitarian cause, a challenging program for America. Is this the same program with which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] was so concerned in previous years?

Mr. FOGARTY. This is the same program that the gentleman from Wisconsin has done so much to put into effect and I am sorry he is not here today because I know he is 100 percent behind it. I was hoping he would be here in the closing days of his service to the country and to the Congress so that he could speak and that the Congress in turn would by its action in voting these appropriations show its appreciation to the gentleman from Wisconsin for the wonderful work he has done in the past 12 years since he has been a Member of this body.

Mr. CANFIELD. The gentleman by his amendment asks for one-nineteenth of the $38,000,000 we gave to Tito and his government during the past week. He is asking for the sum of $2,000,000 for the health and welfare of America. I am supporting the gentleman in his effort.

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOGARTY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. PRIEST. As the author of the bill creating these two institutes and as chairman of the subcommittee on health reporting the bill to the Congress, I want to express my appreciation for the effective statement the gentleman has just made. I join him in feeling that it would be a tragic delay to wait 6 months to continue this great work with ACTH and cortisone. I hope the gentleman's amendment will be adopted.

Mr. FOGARTY. I appreciate the words of the gentleman from Tennessee.

I sincerely hope that the Members of the House this afternoon will give some consideration to this most worthy cause. I was never more sincere in my life when I say to you this afternoon that we could not pay for anything more humane than such a program as this; the possibility of helping these people who cannot help themselves; that medical science does not know anything about. There is not a doctor existing in the world today that can do anything for a man that has multiple sclerosis. The only thing he can do is to give you an idea of about how long you may live. It is a progressive disease that no one can do anything about, and until we make a mass attack on some of these killing diseases of humanity we are never going to find the answer, because the work is not being done at the present time. I am just as sure as I stand here today that the accomplishment that we will be able to render the people of our country by appropriating this $2,000,000 cannot be termed in numbers of dollars, only in the relief of the suffering and the pain of the millions afflicted with this disease at the present time.

Intensified research in the field of arthritis and metabolic diseases offers exceptional opportunity for success. Recent important research discoveries and tools, such as cortisone, radioactive isotopes for tracer work, and electron microscopy, have provided bases and methods previously unknown with which to work. As I indicated, immediate results, notably in the metabolic diseases, would have a direct effect in improving military medicine and sustaining civilian health.

A comprehensive research program covering fundamental investigations, development, and production of drugs and therapeutic agents, clinical trials and application, with specific attention to arthritis and other metabolic diseases, is planned. These would be undertaken by qualified scientists, supported by grants-in-aid, and by those now and to be employed at the National Institutes of Health.

Research on rheumatoid arthritis and related diseases will receive additional emphasis and support, not only because of their high incidence but because of their singularly tragic and crippling effects. Efforts will be made to increase the supply of remedial drugs, to develop improved methods of diagnosis, to investigate causes and possible prevention of these diseases.

The success of cortisone and of ACTH—adrenocorticotropic hormone—in treatment of rheumatoid arthritis and other diseases call for increased attention to isolation and manufacture of similar compounds. Research to determine the course of these compounds in the body, as well as organs involved, must be undertaken through intensive laboratory and clinical testing. In this connection I want to relate the case of penicillin, which is directly in point. Following the realization of the potentialities of this antibiotic, production and more production was ordered. From September 1941 until March 1945 production difficulties were met and finally conquered. In large part, these program aims were achieved through coordination by the Office of Scientific Research and Development. By 1943, when chemical procedures had been fairly well standardized, production in the small pilot plants had increased to 40,000,000 units a month from 10,000,000 in 1942. It was then time to build factories, and priorities were issued in 1943 by the War Production Board. Defense Plant Corporation financed construction costs where needed and the Public Health Service undertook testing of products. The result of the completed integrated venture is told succinctly in Scientists Against Time, the history of OSRD, page 350—and I quote:

> Since the aim of the program was to produce penicillin, its success is best indicated by the figures of production. In evaluating these figures, 1,000,000 units may be taken as the average amount required to treat a single patient. In June 1943, 425,000,000 units were produced; in December 1943, 9,195,000,000 units, a twenty-two-fold increase; in June 1944, 117,527,000,000 units, a further thirteenfold increase; in December 1944, 293,376,000,000 units; in June 1945, 646,818,000,000 units. As production increased the cost of the product fell. A package of 100,000 units which originally sold at wholesale for $20 now sells for considerably less than $1, of which 20 percent is the cost of packaging.

Through this effort, sufficient quantities were provided for military and civilian use and at an extremely modest cost. The mobilization of both research and engineering talent to conquer a complex problem demonstrates, beyond guesswork, the need for providing support which can lead to a similar effort, if determined to be necessary.

In the event of large scale atomic or radiation attack, it will be of utmost importance to have supplies of blood or blood substitutes available. Research on blood substances and substitutes in shock and burn conditions must be continued. You may have heard about the recently announced discovery by PHS scientists of the efficacy of a saline solution which can be taken orally for treatment of thermal burns. This most significant addition to civilian defense has already been adopted by defense officials. Other blood research will analyze characteristics of white cells which change in different diseases, thus providing guides before and after operations. Blood work has been classed by the defense agencies as of prime importance at this time.

In neurology and blindness, the Service plans to attack not only specific diseases but to initiate a pioneering program emphasizing basic studies in disease identification, relationships and body reactions. Hopeless invalidism once characterized those afflicted with multiple sclerosis, epilepsy, cerebral palsy, and other neurological diseases. Today, new methods of rehabilitation, new treatments and drugs indicate miraculous improvement and freedom from utter dependency. But only a beginning has been made. Rehabilitation is based on trial and error—not on basic knowledge. Drugs are only partly successful, they aid only in certain forms of these disorders. There are no "cures" even in sight. Scarcely a start has been made on prevention. Research in the neurological disorders stands today about where research in the infectious diseases stood 30 years ago.

The $2,600,000 requested to start these programs would be used to organize the new institutes and to begin outside support to universities and research agencies to undertake complementary studies and to support instruction in clinical and research techniques. This aid is absolutely essential to increase the supply of specialized manpower and to stimulate entry of young scientists into these fields. Research grants will be awarded only after competent technical review by outside consultants and the Advisory Councils.

Of this sum, $250,000 would be used for grants for research in control and rehabilitation methods. Far-sighted physicians and social-service workers have long felt that research in and development of methods of home and clinic treatment of arthritic and rheumatic diseases is needed to enable the chronic and crippled individual to be a useful member of society. In neurology and blindness, special grants are equally essential for research in the initiation, development, and improvement of control and rehabilitation methods and devices. These grants to be awarded to qualified agencies, institutions, hospitals, and universities, will also be made on the recommendation of the appropriate National Advisory Council.

I cannot too strongly urge favorable action on a request which, in monetary terms, is extremely modest in proportion to the total defense expenditure. It must be evident, however, that in terms of its value, in terms of waging war and enjoying peace, it is one of the most profitable and productive investments we can make.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCRIVNER].

Mr. SCRIVNER. Mr. Chairman, knowing the deep sincerity of the chairman of our subcommittee, of course, it is distasteful to me personally to find myself in opposition of his amendment. However, I would point out this, that this is not an urgent thing. These diseases have been suffered since the beginning of time.

We are concerned primarily now with the urgency of appropriations for military defense of this Nation without which even those people so suffering cannot live. It is quite possible, knowing the headway made with cortisone and ACTH, that by delaying this program until the regular appropriation comes in next year you may find that it will be possible to more clearly, succinctly, and successfully set this program up so that there will be a greater understanding of the problem, a greater understanding of the possibilities thereof. Of course, I might point out that this is just a very small camel that is getting a very small nose under the tent. But, before this program is over it will run into many, many millions of dollars, and this is merely one of the social activities for which there were no budgeted funds which must at this particular time give way to the urgent demands for military defense.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Chairman, there is no budget estimate for this item. When we approach a problem of this kind I like to see it done carefully, especially in times when we need every dollar there is. The amendment itself that has been offered indicates that it has not had careful consideration because it calls for $2,665,000 to operate an activity which would have to start not earlier than the 1st of February and continue through about 5 months. The whole request that is going to be allowed by the budget for next year is only $3,000,000. Now, it has been handled on such an elaborate basis that it shows the trouble we get into when we attempt to do things without them being properly budgeted and without having the facts developed so that we know where we are at. We ought not to adopt amendments and embark upon programs that are going to cost many millions of dollars when we need every dollar for defense.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island.

Mr. FOGARTY. In view of the fact that the budget allocated $3,000,000 for this fiscal year, it was justified.

Mr. TABER. That was for a whole year.

Mr. FOGARTY. No.

Mr. TABER. This is for 5 months. That is all that could be available for it. It is so elaborate and so beyond all reason that I do not see how the House could give it favorable consideration.

Mr. FOGARTY. The budget did justify $3,000,000 for this fiscal year.

Mr. TABER. I wonder if the gentleman feels that $3,000,000 for 1 year is the same as $2,600,000 for 5 months.

Mr. FOGARTY. The $3,000,000 was not for 1 year, because the bill was not signed into law until August 15, and this was justified on the basis of starting sometime around the first of October. This amount I have is only $2,600,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the gentleman from Missouri is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is a very appealing amendment. It has a very laudatory purpose. I wish we had means to take care of it. I wish we could do something about it. But, Mr. Chairman, there is a stream of butchered and suffering men pouring back from the front every day. And we are borrowing the money to take care even of these. To ask us to divert funds from the hospitalization of the human wreckage being steadily ground out at the front is one of the most absurd and unreasonable propositions ever offered on this floor.

Mr. Chairman, St. Paul said, "This one thing I do." That is what the American people must reiterate today, "This one thing we do. We must win this war." We must devote our time and resources to that one task until the Nation is safe. In order to do it, we must quit spending money for anything not directly connected with, and contributing to, the success of the war. We do not have money enough for essential military needs and services, much less money enough to waste on other things, however desirable they may seem at the time.

Mr. Chairman, we must have some teamwork on this floor. We must have some coordinated effort on the part of Members here to spend the small amount of money we have left where it will do the most good in defense of the Nation. I trust we will have the support of all patriotic Members to that effect.

I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOGARTY) there were—ayes 26, noes 59.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FOGARTY: On page 8, after line 12, insert:

"PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

"Grants for hospital construction: Section 1214 of the General Appropriation Act, 1951, shall not be applicable during the fiscal year 1951 to the item 'Grants for hospital construction' contained in chapter V of said act."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Rhode Island desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. FOGARTY. I do not, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has examined the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY] against which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has made a point of order. It appears to the Chair rather clearly that the amendment seeks to amend existing law. Therefore, it would be legislation on an appropriation bill, in violation of the rules of the House. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FOGARTY: On page 8, after line 12, insert:

"PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

"Grants for hospital construction: For construction grants under part C, title VI, of the Public Health Service Act, as amended, $75,000,000, to be allotted to the several States as provided in such part C, except that such amount shall be available during the fiscal year 1951 only to the extent necessary to bring the allotments to the several States during such fiscal year to the total basis of $150,000,000, as authorized."

HOSPITAL SURVEY AND CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

Mr. FOGARTY. Mr. Chairman, there is probably not one Member of Congress who is not familiar with the Hospital Survey and Construction Act and the accomplishments of this program in all the States and Territories since its inception on August 13, 1946. As chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee hearing this program, I have become more particularly interested in the program, its objectives and accomplishments.

It was in the period just prior to and at the beginning of our Nation's activities in World War II that the acute shortage of adequate health facilities for those of our people who needed hospital care became apparent. Not only was there a lack of hospital beds but the distribution of beds as indicated by the location of hospitals showed the greatest need to be in the rural areas and those areas close to industrial centers.

Recognizing the inadequacy of our hospital plant, leaders in the health field joined with public-spirited citizens, acquired the support of the American Medical Association, and established a Commission on Hospital Care under the auspices of the American Hospital Association. This commission studied the Nation's hospital resources and made recommendations concerning a long-range plan for providing adequate hospital facilities. The Congress passed the Hill-Burton Act in 1946 which provided for a program of hospital survey and construction in all the States and Territories. This act provided for a joint Federal, State, and community effort. The program has, in general, been proceeding most satisfactorily. In 4 years of operation 72,000 hospital beds have been added. Over 300 projects have been completed and are in operation. Over 1,500 projects have been approved and over 800 of these are currently under construction. However, over 800,000 additional hospital beds are still necessary to meet the minimum needs for hospital services in this country. This estimate does not take into consideration the increased need due to the present international situation.

You will recall that the amendments to the Hospital Survey and Construction Act passed by the Eighty-first Congress, increased from $75,000,000 to $150,000,000 the contract authority for hospital construction. The Eighty-first Congress also provided for a similar contract authority of $150,000,000 through 1955. The action by this Congress in continuing the contract authorization at $150,000,000 for fiscal year 1951 despite attempts to reduce it was a unanimous one. I believe it was a gratifying recognition of the success of the program to date and recognized importance of adequate hospitals to the Nation's health. One cannot challenge the fact that a healthy nation is a strong nation.

The action by this Congress was important since it assured the States and the local communities of the support of their government in their plans for hospital construction. This is extremely important in view of one of the program's primary objectives, namely national planning. Each State continues to survey its hospital needs and to revise and develop its plans, thinking always of the needs of city and town. The development of an orderly construction program must include the needs for special facilities such as mental disease, chronic disease and tuberculosis, as well as those relating to general hospitals. In planning for good hospital programs designed to provide adequate hopsital service for our total population, it would seem that the States should have adequate assurance of Federal support.

You will further recall that the Public Health Service and the State agencies administering this program operated under continuing resolutions as authorized by Congress during the first 2 months of the present 1951 fiscal year. In so doing, the several State agencies made grant commitments to hundreds of communities throughout the Nation on the basis of contract authority of $150,000,000. Project sponsors in these communities on the basis of grant commitments from their respective State agencies entered into specific contracts. The contracts related to the acqusition of sites, preparation of architectural plans and specifications, engineering services, conduct of fund raising campaigns, the authorization and sale of bonds and other related contractual operations, thus committing a substantial portion of the sponsor's share of project costs. The States and communities had every reason to assume that the Congress and the Executive Branch of Government would observe its commitments, particularly since it was this very Congress which last year expanded the program and in the spring voted the full one hundred and fifty million contract authorization. Nevertheless, the Bureau of the Budget in implementing section 1214 of the General Appropriations Act which required a five hundred and fifty million savings chose to cut this program in half by establishing a reserve of $75,000,000 against the $150,000,000 voted by the Congress. The effect upon State and community planning and upon the program in general is almost immeasurable. The many months, and in some cases, years of planning are completely disrupted.

The State agencies administering the program have had to revise their schedules for the present fiscal year. I am advised that in so doing over 450 projects scheduled for inclusion in the 1951 program—over 450 communities are having to have their projects postponed to a later fiscal year or in some instances, completely eliminated from the program. These projects would provide over 22,000 hospital beds to the Nation's critical bed supply. Over 150 of these communities have raised their own funds from local subscriptions, bond issuances, or local taxation and must now await Federal funds in ensuing fiscal years. In other localities the situation is even more serious. There are 88 communities distributed over 31 States which have acquired sites, raised local funds, and proceeded with architectural plans into the final drawing stage. Many more have in fact acquired sites, employed architects, raised funds, or otherwise obligated themselves. In these instances local obligations have been incurred, relying upon the good faith of the Congress. We cannot permit them to feel that we, the same Representatives in the same Congress, let them down.

Not only did the establishment of a $75,000,000 reserve for the present fiscal year seriously disrupt the program, but in support of this action the information issued is misleading. A number of State governors were advised that there was a balance of approximately ninety-one million dollars available from 1950 funds and that the $75,000,000 to this $91,000,000 would exceed the $150,000,000 required for the 1951 program. Similarly, press notices appearing in newspapers throughout the Nation noted a carry-over of $92,000,000 to the present fiscal year.

However, you are aware that contract-authorization amounts for this program, made available by the Congress for a given fiscal year, remain available during a 2-year period. Thus the 1950 contract authorization for hospital construction—available for obligation during a 2-year period—was $150,000,000. At the end of the first year of availability—June 30, 1950—$58,000,000 had been committed to projects under construction by that date. Seventy million to projects not under construction, with a balance of twenty-two million not specifically earmarked to projects. These latter two items total ninety-two million. The program, of course, continued to operate since the funds were available for another full fiscal year. By September 12, 1950, when the reserve was established, of these 1950 funds, eighty-five million was committed to projects under construction, sixty million to projects not yet under construction, leaving a balance of approximately five million. However, it must be emphasized that neither the ninety-two million nor the sixty million represent free and available balances. Of these funds, all but five million had been committed to projects sponsors and applicants—communities which, relying upon commitments or initial approval of their projects by the State agencies and the Public Health Service, proceeded to acquire sites, raised funds through bond issues and other means, hired architects and consultants, and proceeded with the detailed preparation of construction plans and specifications.

The remaining balance of five million could be regarded as a reserve for change-order increases during construction. Virtually all of the 1950 funds had been committed and were therefore not available for the 1951 program; the statements, therefore, that larger sums were available for the 1951 program is misleading, and at best represent a failure to correctly understand the program.

Lest it be thought that I am supporting needless expenditure on the home front in the light of the national crisis, may I point out the national defense aspects of hospital construction activities. It may be regarded as providential that the hospital survey and construction program is adding hospitals in the rural areas to a larger extent than in the urban areas. Of approximately 1,500 projects already approved three-fourths are for general hospital construction and about one-half of these are for completely new hospitals. At least 75 percent of these new general hospital projects are located in places with populations below 10,000. There is a trend that shows that physicians are establishing their practices in these small towns instead of remaining in the urban areas as has been the pattern during the past two decades. The modern medical practice requires instruments of precision, X-ray facilities and laboratories. These modern hospitals include such facilities and permit medicine to be practiced on the high level being taught in our medical schools. Adequate health facilities attract adequately trained health workers and result in better patient care in areas which previously did not have physicians. Today we need more than ever adequate hospitals in the areas outside of the larger centers of population. Need I spell out in detail why I make that statement. I do not think it necessary. Times such as those of today when our international, national, and personal tranquillity has been unbalanced means that we must find ways and means of preserving the very basis of our democracy, the most precious possession our democracy cherishes, namely, the individual. I point out that the health of that individual is one of our greatest assets and must be guarded. Our whole economy is dependent upon the health and productiveness of that individual.

In a geared-up production period so essential to our existence in the world today there will be shortages of material and manpower in all fields. Plans and methods pertaining to this vital subject are occupying many of us in this Congress. I have no doubt that they will be adequate for the job to be done. I submit that we will have sufficient materials and manpower available during this period of the greatest productivity this Nation has ever known to permit the underpinning of all our essential resources. It is inconceivable to me that we would permit deficiencies in materials, supplies, and manpower to limit the building of vital health facilities which are so greatly needed. Facilities for the health of our people; the care of the sick; the hospital care of those needing it; the public health services needed must be available. The maintenance of the health properly conducted is an essential commodity at any time. In times of stress, in times of a possible catastrophe either from physical forces or from bacterial forces brought about either by man or by nature we need the protective influence of adequate health resources properly organized and conducted.

The fact that we need at present more, better, and serviceable health facilities—hospitals, health centers, and community clinics cannot be disputed. A review of the State plans as required by the Hill-Burton Act, Public Law 725, Seventy-ninth Congress and as amended by Public Law 380, Eighty-first Congress shows that a minimum need of over 800,000 hospital beds should be added to the 1,000,000 beds now in existence. We must achieve that goal even for a peacetime existence. The Hill-Burton program is geared to that end. Let us not now further handicap ourselves by postponing these efforts through permitting that program to be cut back to $75,000,000 in 1951. The Federal Government has an obligation to work with the States and local communities in carrying out this program as planned. We cannot, we should not shirk our responsibility. We must keep our covenant with the people of this country.

I have studied this matter and I have developed a great appreciation of the need for adequate health facilities. I am prepared to offer at this time an amendment which will permit the hospital survey and construction program to continue to go forward. It is with a feeling of great pride that I seek to keep our covenant with the citizenry of this precious democracy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY] has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 5 minutes, 2 minutes to be reserved to the committee and 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, this is, in effect, the same proposition presented by the last amendment. Even in prosperous times, when we had no appreciable debt and had no war in the offing, we made no appropriation for such items as this. Now we have the most stupendous debt the world ever saw and a menacing war situation confronting us. We are already giving them $75,000,000—money we do not have—money that is needed in the war program.

These civilian hospitals are nondefense items. They are local responsibilities and should be supported by the localities which they serve. The local municipalities, counties, and States are solvent and are operating in the black, while the Federal Government is in the red and going deeper every day. We should use this money where it is really needed, for field hospitals, base hospitals, first-aid stations at the front, and for veterans' hospitals, and let the communities take care of their own civilian hospitals. The bill before us is a bill for national defense. It is to be hoped no further inroads will be made on the funds from which the defense items must be appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has expired.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is recognized for 3 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this same money was appropriated last year in the bill and it presently is impounded in the Treasury of the United States by the President because in looking the picture over he did not believe that the necessity for this fund was as great as the necessity for the expenditure for the war effort.

I may say that in my own territory there was a case where they wanted some of this money but could not get it because it was impounded. They went out and raised the money themselves to build their own hospital facilities, and did build them. They can do it everywhere else if they will.

I hope that we will not upset the picture that the President has created in here. The $75,000,000 was once made available. We should not try to make another $75,000,000 available when the President impounded the first.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. FOGARTY].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 17: The first proviso in the paragraph under the head "United States Maritime Commission, ship construction" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951, is hereby amended by striking out "December 31, 1950" and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1951."

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the language beginning after the comma following the figures "1951" and reading as follows: "is hereby amended by striking out 'December 31, 1950' and inserting in lieu thereof 'June 30, 1951,'" that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. We concede the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri concedes the point of order; the point of order is sustained.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this matter was threshed out in the committee this morning. The action just taken is the action of our distinguished chairman, acting through the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL]. Some other language, Mr. Chairman, is also subject to a point of order and I make it against the entire paragraph; then I want to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman mean to strike the paragraph?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, that paragraph and the next one, all of it dealing with the Maritime Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas to strike out the language?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, that would cover the rest of the paragraph and the following paragraph after that to which a point of order is pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please indicate the language that he wants stricken.

Mr. THOMAS. All of the language under that head pertaining to the Maritime Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think the Committee ought to know what language is being stricken. I ask that the language that is to be stricken be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman has requested the gentleman from Texas to read the language that he has included in his request. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

MARITIME ACTIVITIES

The first proviso in the paragraph under the head "United States Maritime Commission, ship construction" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951, is hereby amended by striking out "December 31, 1950," and inserting in lieu thereof "June 30, 1951."

Appropriations and contract authority made available to the United States Maritime Commission for ship construction in the fiscal years 1950 and 1951, and in addition thereto $224,000,000, including not to exceed $500,000 which may be transferred to the appropriation "Salaries and expenses" for necessary administrative costs without regard to limitations thereon in said appropriations, and including not to exceed $15,000,000 for the construction, activation, acquisition and expansion of plants or facilities, on land whether owned by the Government or otherwise owned, shall be available, without regard to the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 with respect to essential trade routes, for construction of such additional dry-cargo vessels as the Secretary of Commerce, with the approval of the President, shall find necessary for national security: Provided, That such additional vessels shall not be subject to the first proviso under the head "New ship construction" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1950, or the last proviso under the head "Ship construction" in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951.

Salaries and expenses

Limitations under the head "Salaries and expenses," United States Maritime Commission, in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951, are amended as follows: "Maintenance of shipyard facilities" is increased from "$452,000" to "$483,000," and "Maintenance and operation of terminals" is decreased from "$765,000" to "$734,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I do this because I think the Members would like to know what is going on. The reason it was necessary to have this read was so that Members might get some idea of what is proposed to be stricken by the request of the gentleman from Texas. The language which has been read constitutes an amendment that was adopted in the full committee this morning. The printed copies of the bill available to the Members of the House do not show that language, so that the only way we can tell what is here being done is either to understand what the Clerk has just read or to ask the gentleman from Texas to explain what he proposes to do. May I say this as the basis for reserving the right to object? The budget as it was presented to the subcommittee made available certain balances for the construction of some faster ships, cargo ships, estimated to be from 10 to 14 knots. The gentleman from Texas proposed in the subcommittee the addition of some additional funds to the other balances which would have made possible the construction of a large number of cargo vessels. I anticipate—perhaps I should not anticipate—that the purpose of the gentleman from Texas in asking that this language be stricken is that he wants to offer some language which would be in order that would make possible the purpose that he sought to accomplish by adding the other money, but which was stricken out here on a point of order that was made by the gentleman from Arkansas.

I should like to yield to the gentleman from Texas if he cares to state whether or not that is the fact, and then I shall withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. THOMAS. Our distinguished friend who will soon leave us and go to the Senate has stated it correctly. Of course, the language that was stricken on the point of order by the gentleman from Arkansas was the budget language. No one raised that question before in committee this morning and, of course, it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. THOMAS: Page 9, after line 16, insert :"Department of Commerce, maritime activities, ship construction: For the construction of cargo vessels in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936, as amended, $350,000,000."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, that very simple language that you have just heard read appropriating $350,000,000 is exactly the same that we did in about 20 lines in the bill as reported from the committee.

May I give you the history back of it? The language that was stricken on the first point of order took the vitals out of the first half of it, namely, about $126,000,000.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman struck some additional language, salaries and expenses. Would that be affected by the present amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir, because the same amount of money is included in this exact language. Here is the problem, and I will state it to you very frankly. We are trying to build some fast cargo ships. The Maritime Administration, under its new cleaned-house management, I might say, have developed these plans whereby we can build some 20- to 22-knot ships. They will go unescorted.

This is the most economical ship that we can possibly have; not only economical in money but economical in saving manpower of the Navy and everybody else concerned in the escorting of ships. We are told by the Maritime Administration that we need several hundred of these ships. We were also told that they will be built on the Atlantic coast, the Gulf coast, and the Pacific coast, and that it will take 11 to 14 months to build them. I plead with you, my colleagues, we have heard many fine speeches today on national defense. Let us not have it hurled at us again, "Too little, too late." Eleven to fourteen months is a tremendously long time to wait to build these ships. We ought to have them now. Of course, we have 1,600 what we call ugly ducklings laying up on the Atlantic coast, the Pacific coast, and the Gulf coast, last war's ships. Certainly we used poor judgment in building them, because we cannot give them away now. Industry cannot use them. They are too slow. They will make only 10 knots. They have to go escorted, and when they go escorted, they make only 7½ knots. It has been testified by the experts in the Maritime Administration that they are the most expensive ships we can possibly have. Of course, we are going to use most of them. We are going to use them where the ships do not have to go escorted, and bring in such materials as bauxite and other heavy, bulky cargoes, moving the ships up and down our coastlines, to South America, and so forth. This is purely a national defense item. The subcommittee voted for it unanimously, and it was adopted by the full committee. I ask your support of it.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the chairman of the subcomimttee in his statement, and in his request that this amendment be adopted. The Maritime Commission, under new leadership and direction, went to the Budget Bureau and then came to the Congress asking for an extension of time in order that they might use all funds available at the present time to build a new and faster type of cargo ship. The motion of the gentleman from Arkansas was to strike out that request and to stop the building of any new-type vessels after December 31 of this year. I do not believe that was his intention. I believe he would have offered some substitute motion. The subcommittee hearing the evidence from the present Maritime direction realized that the figures had been made up by the Bureau of the Budget prior to the present break in the war situation in Korea, and we decided it was necessary to give the Maritime Commission permission, and money, to start building more of the faster type ships if we are to have them available for the use of men and materials when they will be needed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Continuing my statement, Mr. Chairman, the subcommittee, therefore, feeling that this was a matter of time if we are to have vessels ready, when it would take a year or more to build them, and if it is necessary to open shipyards in order to build them. It will be necessary to have enough ships under construction to keep the work going and train the men, so we felt that it was desirable to give this agency more money than actually had been requested by a Budget Bureau which had acted upon a situation prior to the present situation in Korea.

I hope, therefore, that the House will vote as the Appropriations Committee voted upon the same matter in the committee meeting this morning, and vote to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NORRELL. I yield.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in not to exceed 10 minutes after the expiration of the time of the gentleman from Arkansas, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri and one-half by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I object.

Mr. NORRELL. Mr. Chairman, the membership of the House is entitled to know why the point of order was made a while ago on the two paragraphs. Of course there is no law authorizing such appropriation. The reason there is not is that the budget which was submitted to the committee contained no estimate for these ships. It did contain a fine all-around program of shipbuilding and other national-defense articles. There was no budget estimate for this amount. If this amendment is adopted there will be no estimate from the budget providing the $350,000,000 involved here. It is not in the President's budget. It has been vetoed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff of the defense forces of the United States. There is a reason for that, and the reason is that there are now in storage over 2,000 commercial ships not being used. They do not need them and have not even called them out yet. Are we going to spend $350,000,000 not authorized by the President, not mentioned and provided by the budget, and vetoed by the Joint Chiefs of Staff at a time when we have over 2,000 commercial ships in storage and not in use I say to you that we should follow the recommendation of the Joint Chiefs of Staff with reference to the activities of the War Department during this war.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this is an item which the committee has put in with a budget estimate. My understanding of the actual situation is that the Maritime Commission has made a contract for a set of plans which perhaps are not quite completed, with the Bethlehem Steel Co., shipbuilding division. They propose to build a ship which will have a speed of 20 knots.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. May I say to my friend I think he is in error when he says there was no budget estimate. There was a budget estimate for 16 of the ships. Your subcommittee, and incidentally the gentleman from Arkansas did not hear one word of that testimony, and is not a member of the subcommittee. As I was saying, your subcommittee took that budget estimate and built it up and authorized 34 more, making a total of 50 on the theory that we should not be too little and too late.

Mr. TABER. I think that is correct. They expect that these ships will cost $6,000,000 each, but for budget purposes they want $7,500,000. I would be willing to go ahead on what the Budget suggested, just about $100,000,000; but when you make it two hundred and fifty or three hundred and fifty million more than the Budget asked for, for a ship that has never been built and nobody knows how well it will work, it is a little difficult for me to follow that kind of business. It looks to me as if they were asking so much money that they would be so cumbersome in their operation and so ridiculous in going into things that have not been tried on a very large scale, that we ought not to do it. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL] made the statement that we had available at the present time several thousand vessels. I would like to ask the gentleman if he knows exactly, so that a correction can be made on that.

Mr. TABER. I think we have 1,600 so-called Liberty ships in mothballs, ready to be fixed up.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Not necessarily in mothballs, but just lying around.

Mr. TABER. Well, they are supposed to be ready. Then they have about 125 of the so-called Victory ships that have not been placed in commission.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. How fast are those ships?

Mr. TABER. Oh, they are perhaps 15 knots.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. In other words, the Liberty ship is the slowest ship, and that will make about 10 knots, and the other about 15.

Mr. TABER. That is correct.

Mr. PHILLIPS of California. Those results are not satisfactory in wartime, are they?

Mr. TABER. Neither are the others that are designed, because the snorkel submarines are supposed to go 26 knots. These that are designed are only supposed to go 20 on a surface run, and once in a while, under forced draft, 21 or 22. That is where the trouble comes in. You are asking for a more expensive ship than the ones you have got, and you are not solving the question.

Mr. REDDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. REDDEN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. NORRELL] said the Joint Chiefs of Staff vetoed the production of these ships. Could the gentleman tell us on what ground they vetoed the production of these ships?

Mr. TABER. Well, I do not know whether they vetoed it or not. All I know is that they approved the budget with an estimate for about 15 of these ships. I may be wrong. It may be 16, or something like that, whereas this would call for something like 70.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment, and all amendments thereto, do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GORE) there were—ayes 83, noes 114.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. THOMAS) there were—ayes 42, noes 61.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAND: On page 9, after line 17, insert a new paragraph to read as follows:

"Federal assistance in major disasters: To carry out Public Law 875, Eighty-first Congress, an act to authorize Federal assistance to States and local governments in major disasters, and for other purposes, approved September 30, 1950, the sum of $5,000,000."

Mr. HAND. Mr. Chairman, this amendment really is offered in a sense to test the good faith of our body and of the administration. On September 30, 1950, the act was passed, Public Law 875, which provided for Federal assistance to States and local governments in the event of a major disaster.

Section 2 of that act defines a major disaster to mean a flood, hurricane, storm, or other catastrophe in any part of the United States which in the determination of the President threatens to be of sufficient severity to warrant Federal aid.

Whether or not you agree with the wisdom of passing the act, it was passed by the Congress and approved without any substantial opposition on September 30, 1950. A very short time after it was approved, in fact, November 25, 1950, a storm of almost unexampled severity struck in virtually all parts of the United States. I am concerned with the effects of that storm which devastated large areas in my district, not only for the district which I represent, but for other districts which were likewise severely affected by the emergency. For example, part of my district is now flooded with water. There are required sand bags at least as an emergency measure to prevent further floods. There is a very considerable loss of life in one of my counties on the Delaware Bay shore. There has been a tremendous loss involving millions of dollars of property on the Atlantic shore in my area.

As I say, whether or not you feel this type of legislation is such that the Congress ought to pass or whether you feel the States should take care of their own emergencies, even though they may be of a catastrophic nature, the fact is that the Congress passed that Act. After the storm on November 25, we came down to see whether or not we could get relief under the Act which this Congress passed and I found upon inquiry that the administration and the Congress never implemented it by an appropriation of money required and authorized by the act.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAND. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. STEFAN. I am somewhat familiar with that act because I, too, have floods in my district, but I believe there are some funds remaining on hand which are not expended as yet. Has the gentleman appeared before the proper agency?

Mr. HAND. I may say to the gentleman from Nebraska that my impression is that under a previous act which was repealed by this act, there were some small funds remaining, but my official information is to the effect that the $5,000,000 authorized by this act which we passed on September 30 have never been appropriated. If we are acting in good faith the appropriation should be made because the act was passed for the very purpose of taking care of the situation which struck many of us on November 25.

Mr. STEFAN. Has the gentleman appeared before an agency to secure some of the unexpended balance or before the committee to ask for an appropriation?

Mr. HAND. I may say to the gentleman that I have not because my impression is the funds remaining are entirely inadequate. Indeed, the funds authorized by this act on a national basis are likewise inadequate.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAND. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman will find that funds were appropriated but the President impounded them recently and they cannot be spent for the purpose for which they were intended. It seems to me if we can afford to give money to all these countries all over the world we ought to be able to do something for our own people back in the States of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and other States.

Mr. HAND. Of course, I certainly agree with the gentleman. I may say further that on wiring the President for action under this act he wrote me a very sympathetic letter saying he would like to act if he could and that he would make an investigation. As I said before, I really want to test our good faith. Did we pass this act on September 30 as merely a useless gesture or merely as a sop to make the localities or States think we were going to do something for them, or did we mean business? If we meant business, here is our opportunity. We are in the emergency now and here is an opportunity to implement that law which we passed by the appropriation of a comparatively small sum compared with the total bill we are discussing. All we ask is $5,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for favorable consideration of my amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this of course is a new program, it is a nondefense item and there is no budget estimate for it. Nor was it included in the program sent down to us by the Defense Department. It may be said further that the weather experienced here in the last few weeks is mild compared with the weather experienced by our armies in North Korea the last few weeks.

This is neither the time nor the bill for an item of this character. I trust the amendment will be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HAND].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

For an additional amount, $64,500,000, to remain available until expended: Provided, That purchases and contracts for supplies or services may be made by the Authority during the fiscal year 1951 without regard to any provisions of law relating to advertising or competitive bidding.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the proviso on line 9, running down to line 12 on page 11 that it is legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. GORE. Would the gentleman withhold the point of order until I could plead with him and give him the reasons why the subcommittee put this in?

Mr. TABER. I will withhold it.

Mr. GORE. The Atomic Energy Commission called upon the Tennessee Valley Authority to build at the quickest possible moment a huge steam plant to furnish power for the gaseous diffusion plant producing uranium—U235—at or near Paducah, Ky. The TVA said that with the greatest possible speed the steam plant could not be producing power as quickly as needed by the AEC production facilities, and that if they were forced to resort to competitive bidding they might not find a supplier who could supply the generators and the turbines quickly enough to meet the emergency schedule. Therefore, this language is necessary in order to meet the urgent dead line given by the Atomic Energy Commission. I plead with the gentleman not to make his point of order.

Mr. TABER. You see, they originally had a budget estimate of $84,000,000; then they dropped down to $75,600,000 and now they are down to $64,500,000.

Mr. GORE. That was the action of the subcommittee as a result of a modification of plan by the AEC.

Mr. TABER. Indicating that they did not know what they were doing. It would seem like, if they followed business methods, they might get down even further. It would seem to me that we should insist on that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be heard further on the point of order?

Mr. GORE. If the gentleman insists on the point of order it must, in my opinion, be sustained, but I do feel that the gentleman will make a grievous error in insisting upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist on his point of order?

Mr. TABER. I insist on my point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that the language referred to is legislation on an appropriation bill. The gentleman from Tennessee concedes the point of order.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CASE of South Dakota: Page 11, after line 12, insert a new section, as follows:

"RENEGOTIATION OF CONTRACTS

"SEC. 602. (a) All negotiated contracts for procurement in excess of $1,000 entered into during the current fiscal year by or on behalf of the Atomic Energy Commission and the Tennessee Valley Authority, and all subcontracts thereunder in excess of $1,000, are hereby made subject to the Renegotiation Act of 1948 in the same manner and to the same extent as if such contracts and subcontracts were required by such act to contain the renegotiation article prescribed in subsection (a) of such act. Each contract and subcontract made subject to the Renegotiation Act of 1948 by this section shall contain an article stating that it is subject to the Renegotiation Act of 1948. In determining whether the amounts received or accrued to a contractor or subcontractor during his fiscal year from contracts and subcontracts subject to the Renegotiation Act of 1948 amount in the aggregate to $100,000, receipts or accruals from contracts and subcontracts made subject to such act by this section shall be added to receipts or accruals from all other contracts and subcontracts subject to such act.

"(b) Notwithstanding any agreement to the contrary, the profit limitation provisions of the act of March 27, 1934 (48 Stat. 503, 505), as amended and supplemented, shall not apply to any contract or subcontract which is subject to the Renegotiation Act of 1948.

"(c) The authority, in the Renegotiation Act of 1948, of the Secretary of Defense with respect to contracts entered into by the Department of Defense shall, with respect to contracts entered into by the Atomic Energy Commission, be vested in the Atomic Energy Commission, and shall, with respect to contracts entered into by the Tennessee Valley Authority, be vested in the Tennessee Valley Authority."

Mr. CASE of South Dakota (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the balance of the amendment is technical in nature, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading be dispensed with and that it be printed at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the Members of the House who are familiar with the history of renegotiation during World War II will recognize the term. Early in World War II, by amendment to the Sixth Supplemental Defense Act of 1942, we instituted renegotiation to curb war profiteering. It started as a rather simple amendment but was expanded into a considerable statute. The result of that, however, was that during World War II the Government made recovery of something over $10,000,000,000 in cash, to say nothing of improved forward pricing on new contracts.

When we had under consideration the special appropriation bill in the spring of 1948 to provide for supplemental appropriations for the national defense, and in particular where we provided the additional funds to set up a 70-group air force, the House adopted an amendment I offered which reinstated renegotiation for those funds and any funds consolidated therewith. So, as has been brought out, and as I brought out during the debate on the tax bill the other day, renegotiation is in effect with respect to contracts let by the defense establishment for the Army, Navy, and Air Force because of the funds that have been consolidated with the money that was provided in the special Supplemental Appropriation Act of 1948.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. Was that renegotiation confined to the contracts for that 70-group air force?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. No; it applied to all the money that was provided in that 1948 bill which included other branches of the Defense Establishment. The language in that act also provided that those funds should be consolidated with other funds and the commingling of those funds has continued renegotiation. This was brought out in a colloquy I had with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] when we put into effect some of the first Korean emergency legislation last summer.

This proposal now offered is to extend renegotiation to the Atomic Energy Commission and to the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. THOMAS. Would the gentleman's amendment do any more than bring the TVA and the Atomic Energy Commission under the terms of the Renegotiation Act?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That is all it does. It brings TVA and the Atomic Energy Commission under renegotiation the same as the Defense Establishment is. There is reason for it from the Government's standpoint, and that is so that we shall not permit excessive profits where we are turning vast sums over to the Atomic Energy Commission on estimates that one of their members said in the hearings were high, wide, and handsome.

Mr. THOMAS. If my memory serves me correctly, the Atomic Energy Commission stated at the hearings that they had no objection to being brought under the terms of the Renegotiation Act.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That is correct.

Mr. THOMAS. The TVA representatives said that also, but that they would like the privilege of going back to their main office and studying the proposition, later giving us a letter on it. Whether or not they have given us a letter on it I do not know. I have not seen it.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I have their letters on it, and the pertinent sentences are:

From a letter by Gordon Dean, Chairman of the AEC, under date of December 11, 1950, I read:

> At the outset we would like to state that the Commission is fully in accord with the objective of renegotiation legislation which is to prevent excessive profits derived from defense contracts. * * * If H. R. 9564 were enacted and if the Commission were brought within its terms, a uniformity of policy and interpretative decisions on renegotiation would result.

The letter from TVA is dated December 8, 1950, and was signed by Gordon R. Clapp, Chairman of the Board. The gist of it is in these sentences:

> While we believe it is less important to the Government to make TVA contracts subject to renegotiation than those of other agencies, we would have no objection to the renegotiation of our contracts if the renegotiation proceedings were conducted by some other agency or agencies. We understand that it has been the policy in the past for the Government agency having the largest volume of contracts with a particular supplier to handle the renegotiation proceedings with that supplier for all Federal agencies.

From the standpoint of the contractor, this amendment should be in the bill, because many of the construction contractors are doing business with the Defense Establishment where the contracts are subject to renegotiation, but if they build for the Atomic Energy Commission they are not subject to renegotiation on that portion of their business. Their whole business should be treated alike from the standpoint of the contractor and from the standpoint of the Government.

This is one way to curb excessive war profits; it is an essential step in the prevention of excessive war profits.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. Is there not another reason, that it is an emergency and the contractors do not know themselves how much their profits or losses will be?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That is exactly true.

Mr. REED of New York. Consequently the Defense Department tells them to go ahead regardless, and they will adjust it later.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes. That was the origin of renegotiation, to have a device where we could keep up all speed and yet make it possible to protect the Government. The subcommittee discussed this matter. It was brought to the attention of the agencies in our hearing. The amendment is offered with the approval of the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of our subcommittee. It has been drafted by those who are familiar with existing law and who are experienced in such matters. It seeks simply to put the contracts of the Atomic Energy Commission and the Tennessee Valley Authority under the same law that applies to the funds of the Defense Establishment.

I ask for the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I seek recognition and further reserve my point of order.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the distinguished and able gentleman from South Dakota, is a lengthy, complicated, and far-reaching one. I have tried to read and analyze it at the Clerk's desk. It contains some 250 or 300 words of technical language. It operates as an amendment of the renegotiation law. That is a subject which is even now being considered by the Committee on Ways and Means. I am sure the distinguished gentleman has a worthy purpose in mind. I do not know that I would disagree in any respect with the objective which he seeks, but I am not sure what the objective is and I am not sure what the effect will be, nor do I believe any Member of this body, other than perhaps the author of the amendment himself, has such knowledge. Therefore, I feel, in the name of orderly procedure, we should not adopt here by way of a quickie amendment a far-reaching amendment to the renegotiation law, which I favor.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield; but before the gentleman speaks, may I take this opportunity to congratulate the gentleman and the people of his State upon the promotion given to him and the great honor that has come to him. I want to say that although the gentleman's retirement from this body will be a great loss, the other body will gain a most valuable Member who in due time will become one of its outstanding and most valuable Members.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, when a gentleman prefaces his yielding to another gentleman with language like that, it always cramps the style of the Member who is yielded to in making a point which in any sense modifies the earlier remarks of the gentleman yielding.

Mr. GORE. Having served on the committee with my beloved friend for so long I know how delicately he can cramp a man's style. But I am not attempting to do so in this case. My remarks are genuinely and sincerely made.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman, I do appreciate very much the remarks of the gentleman. I cannot at this time take the time of the House to respond in that particular but I certainly do appreciate them and as well as the other very many kind remarks that Members have been making, either personally or in the deliberations of this body at various times.

However, Mr. Chairman, with respect to this matter, I was hoping the gentleman would not insist upon his point of order in order that the matter might go before the other body. Renegotiation of contracts started that way. The very first amendment which instituted renegotiation was a very simple one which did not have very much detail in it. But it was accepted by the House in March of 1942, and the details were worked out by the other body.

As a result of that we accomplished great savings. If we do not do this at this time then these contractors who are getting these contracts will not be on notice, and the contracts will not carry the clause proposed in the amendment that every such contract shall carry a clause making it subject to the Renegotiation Act of 1948. In view of the fact that the defense establishment is operating under that, and in view of the fact further that the Atomic Energy Commission and the TVA people both in their correspondence have said that they are in favor of the principle and have no objection to coming under the renegotiation law, I was hoping the gentleman would not insist upon his point of order, and permit it to be initiated at this time.

Mr. GORE. In reply, permit me to say I have no objection to the objectives which I think the gentleman has in mind. However, it is not the TVA or the Atomic Energy Commission which by this amendment will be brought under the renegotiation law. It is an amendment of the renegotiation law the extent of which is not now apparent to me. It is a far-reaching amendment, and I believe the Committee on Ways and Means, representing this body, will give careful consideration to the proposal and will report proper legislation covering the matter very soon. In fact, the committee has already completed hearings on the subject.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. This does not amend the renegotiation law except to bring the Atomic Energy Commission and the TVA under it. It does not change the way it operates at the present time with respect to the Defense Establishment.

Mr. GORE. Again, let me say that the renegotiation law applies to contracts. It is not a question of applying it to Government agencies.

Mr. CARROLL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. CARROLL. Will the $18,000,000 we are about to vote on be subject to the renegotiation clause which existed in other appropriation bills?

Mr. GORE. To the extent that the renegotiation law would apply; yes. The committee of which the gentleman is a distinguished member will, I am advised, soon have the whole question of the renegotiation law under further study.

Mr. CARROLL. If the gentleman will permit one further question with reference to the military program in this appropriation bill. Is it subject to renegotiation legislation existing in other appropriation bills at the present time?

Mr. GORE. I believe that statement is true with respect to a large percentage of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The $17,000,000 will be subject to renegotiation, but the billion for TVA and the Atomic Energy Commission will not be.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] has offered an amendment which has been reported. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] has made a point of order against the amendment, on the ground that it contains legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman. I concede the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman concedes the point of order, and therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AIRCRAFT AND RELATED PROCUREMENT

"Aircraft and related procurement", including construction, procurement, and modification of aircraft and equipment, armor and armament, spare parts and accessories therefor; electronic and communication equipment, detection and warning systems, and specialized equipment; expansion of public and private plants, Government-owned equipment and installation thereof in such plants, erection of structures, and acquisition of land without regard to section 1136, Revised Statutes, as amended, for the foregoing purposes, and such land, and interests therein, may be acquired and construction prosecuted thereon prior to the aprpoval of title by the Attorney General as required by section 355, Revised Statutes, as amended; industrial mobilization, including maintenance of reserve plants and equipment and procurement planning; and other expenses necessary for the foregoing purposes, including rents, transportation of things and personal services in the field; to remain available until expended; $2,114,700,000: Provided, That the aircraft procurement program heretofore established for the fiscal year 1951 is further increased by $2,114,700,000.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, earlier in the day we had the privilege of listening to a splendid address by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE].

In order that the record may be kept straight concerning the House of Representatives and its Committee on Appropriations, I would like to read into the RECORD some of the remarks of the Subcommittee on Appropriations dealing with the National Defense Establishment contained in House Report 1797, Eighty-first Congress, second session, filed on March 21, 1950. It reads as follows:

For some 3 or 4 years prior to consideration of the fiscal year 1950 appropriation for the Air Force it had been advocated that a 70-group program was the minimum peacetime Air Force capable of providing adequate security to the United States. Such a program had been supported by Generals Eisenhower and Spaatz, the President's Air Policy Commission, and the Joint Congressional Policy Board. The House of Representatives was strongly behind a program to give to the country an Air Force greater than the 48 groups proposed in the budget estimates for fiscal year 1950. The action of the Congress in enacting the National Military Establishment Appropriation Act, 1950, confirmed its position as to the greater Air Force.

At the conclusion of World War II the Air Force was operating toward a goal of a balanced peacetime establishment capable of meeting the requirements of national security and of providing a proper mobilization potential in the form of a sound and adequate aircraft industry, a trained reserve potential and a physical plant capable of supporting these elements. The core of that establishment was to be composed of 70 first-line groups which gave the name to the entire program, commonly known as the 70-group program.

The 70-group goal had been set while the war was still in progress and it was hoped it could be attained through an orderly reduction from the peak strength of 273 groups reached by the Army Air Force during the war. However, due to the rapid demobilization of the Military Establishment, the Air Force by the end of fiscal year 1947 had been reduced to a level of 38 groups. At this point the trend was halted and the Air Force gradually began to rebuild its strength.

The initial objective was to reach a level of 55 groups by the end of 1947, the groups to be fully manned and to have at least a minimum of training using equipment from World War II, to be in full operational status by the end of fiscal year 1948. The next step toward the 70-group goal was established as a strength of 66 groups to be attained by the end of fiscal year 1949, the remaining 4 groups to be activated during fiscal year 1950.

The reports of the two governmental policy groups referred to above, published during the early part of 1948, were important factors in substantiating Air Force policy and the thinking of the Congress in these regards. Both reports recommended prompt action to recreate the strength of the Air Force through an orderly expansion toward the 70-group goal as the minimum needed to assure national security in time of peace.

During the Eightieth Congress, there was considered a bill authorizing a peacetime 70-group Air Force with a personnel strength appropriate for such a force and including authority to procure 5,200 aircraft a year. The bill had the full approval of those in authority including the President. Under these circumstances the Air Force moved toward an orderly build-up to a 70-group force, including the necessary equipment, personnel, and training to augment the program.

While budget requirements were under consideration for fiscal year 1950, and prior to the submission of the budget to Congress, the President placed specific limitations on the military departments with respect to appropriations for fiscal 1950. These limitations, or ceilings, were well under the amount necessary to carry out the previously planned Air Force programs. To follow the directive required a major reduction in the number of Air Force units and a determination of those areas where reductions could be taken that would least affect the capacity to carry out the program assigned to the Air Force. By the time of committee hearings on the budget estimates it had been determined that the budget ceiling would support no more than 48 groups and those groups to maintain maximum capacity to properly perform their assigned tasks would require some changes in composition.

About the time of the hearings on the 1950 budget estimates, the Air Force had reached a level of about 59 activated groups (not fully implemented). A reduction to the 48-group structure would present a problem of cancellation of procurements and earlier-made plans with some loss to the Government. Most careful consideration was given to the matter by the committee and in the interest of efficiency and savings in not losing that which had been acquired toward the 70-group program which, in the judgment of the committee based upon its own knowledge and the advice from such distinguished men and groups as mentioned above, was essential for the defense of the Nation there was passed by the Congress, sent to the White House and signed by the President, a bill carrying funds for the Air Force in excess of the budget estimates.

The Appropriations Committee then said:

In signing the National Military Establishment Appropriation Act, 1950, the President issued a statement indicating objections to the action of the Congress in increasing funds for the Air Force and directing "the Secretary of Defense to place in reserve the amounts provided by the Congress in H. R. 4146 for increasing the structure of the Air Force," which amounted to an item veto, a power not possessed by the President.

Those are strong words, Mr. Chairman. The committee has stated that when the President directed that these funds be placed in reserve, it "amounted to an item veto, a power not possessed by the President."

Then they go on as follows:

Under article I, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States, the following is provided:

"The Congress shall have the power * * * to declare war * * * to raise and support armies * * * to provide and maintain a Navy." It is evident that the Congress is given the responsibility of providing for the national defense.

On the question of increasing the Air Force program from 48 groups to 58 groups, there was much debate and consideration in the Congress over a period of months prior to the adoption of the 58-group program. In other words, the bill which was passed by the Congress and approved by the President embraced the 58-group program, but the impounding of funds by the President reduced the program from a 58-group program to a 48-group program. A major question of policy was determined by the Congress, and funds were provided to implement the policy but the will of Congress was circumvented.

It is perfectly justifiable and proper for all possible economies to be effected and savings to be made, but there is no warrant or justification for the thwarting of a major policy of Congress by the impounding of funds. If this principle of thwarting the will of Congress by the impounding of funds should be accepted as correct, then Congress would be totally incapable of carrying out its constitutional mandate of providing for the defense of the Nation.

In carrying out the Presidential directive to place in reserve the amounts provided in the law for increasing the structure of the Air Force above the budget requests it now appears from information presented to the committee that the amounts of $157,999,000 cash and $577,755,000 contract authority were placed in reserve. These amounts are at variance with the amounts mentioned in the report of this committee and the amount referred to in the message transmitting to Congress the budget estimates for fiscal year 1951. The committee in its report on the fiscal year 1950 appropriation bill indicated that the budget estimates for the Air Force should be reduced by $51,000,000 through reductions in such fields "as civilian personnel, civilian and military travel, subsistence, clothing and equipage, transportation, economies, and price trends being taken into account."

After explaining the specific reductions in the amount of $51,000,000 the committee plainly stated in its report that the Air Force program was to be increased above the budget estimate in the amount of $800,000,000 plus the above amount, which together would provide funds in the amount of $851,000,000 to accelerate the Air Force program "of which $208,067,000 is in cash and the balance is in contract authorization."

The President in his message to the Congress submitting the 1951 budget in referring to the aircraft procurement program and its costs stated:

"This contemplates that $851,000,000 of 1950 authorizations being held in reserve will be applied against requirements for aircraft to be contracted for in 1951."

Based upon these facts and the direction of the President to the effect that there should be placed "in reserve the amounts provided by the Congress * * * for increasing the structure of the Air Force," it follows that the specific sums of $208,067,000 cash and $642,933,000 contract authority should have been placed in reserve. It now appears from information submitted to the committee (hearings, p. 1313) that the amounts of $157,999,000 cash and $577,755,000 contract authority were placed in reserve, which leaves a difference of $40,068,000 cash and $65,178,000 contract authority.

The committee inquired:

"Mr. MAHON. * * *

"Having failed to secure the 58-group program—at least, the beginning of the 58-group program—the next question arises as to our position now. Are we now in possession of a 48-group program and is our level of aircraft procurement and our level of training and our level of operation such that we can and will, moving in the direction we are now moving, maintain a 48-group program? I would like a well-considered answer to that.

* * * * *

"Let me restate this to see if I exactly understand. The present program before this committee, if projected from year to year, which is a program of about $1,350,000,000 for Air Force procurement, would not bring about or maintain a modern 48-group program.

* * * * *

"By how much do we miss the mark?"

The answer submitted to the committee is as follows:

"Assuming an annual availability of $1,350,000,000 for aircraft procurement, it is estimated that the following states of aircraft inventory modernization will exist at the end of fiscal year 1956. These figures are applicable against the first-line inventory requirements of 48 United States Air Force and 11 Air National Guard groups.

"United States Air Force and Air National Guard groups: First line, 42 groups; second line, 17 groups; total, 59 groups."

In other words, at the rate of aircraft procurement in the present bill, instead of having 48 modern groups in the United States Air Force in 1956, we would have 42 first-line groups. It should be carefully noted that the 59 groups above referred to include the Air National Guard.

Under the budget as submitted to the Congress for fiscal year 1951 it is stated that the strength of the Air Force is to be—

"It is contemplated that the active Air Force will be organized into 48 groups and 13 separate squadrons, approximately its present strength. The Air National Guard and Air Force Reserve will be organized into 27 groups and 25 base wings, respectively."

Thus it will be noted that a projection of the same amount of funds annually for aircraft procurement will produce at the end of fiscal year 1956 a lesser number of modernized groups than is contemplated under the present program for fiscal year 1951. World conditions do not indicate that such a downward trend is justified and it is the opinion of the committee that a restudy and revaluation of military strength projected into future years should be made.

I reiterate, as has been said here before, this Congress and its predecessors have voted not only every dime for national defense which has been requested by the Executive, but it has also increased the amounts both before and since World War II, and since the war certainly those additional moneys for the purchase of modern aircraft for the Air Force have been placed in reserve until Korea happened. But not until Korea was it recognized by the executive department of this Government that we needed to increase our Military Establishment pending events which we here all foresaw. The House of Representatives can congratulate itself on having been foresighted even beyond any foresight evidenced or displayed by the executive department while we commiserate with our country and the armed services over our woeful lack of preparedness at this critical hour.

The Clerk concluded reading the bill.

Mr. WHITE of California. Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for this bill to arm this Nation, but I should like to offer a humble suggestion for a change in basic policy for the Nation.

In my opinion, we have enough to do to enforce the Monroe Doctrine to protect the Western Hemisphere from aggression.

I am opposed to sending our sons to die all over the world in a war that solves nothing more than did World Wars I and II. We should reduce our commitments to defending this hemisphere. That program we may be able to carry out. The present program of our country trying to stop war wherever it breaks out is insane and foolhardy. I want my sons to live to defend their own country—not to die in a war in foreign fields. I feel sure I speak for many other fathers and mothers in this Nation.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9920) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I am, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MARCANTONIO moves to recommit H. R. 9920 to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the bill back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Page 31, after the period in line 4 insert the following: "Provided, That none of the funds appropriated in this act shall be paid to any person, partnership, firm, or corporation which denies equality in employment because of race, color, or creed."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARCANTONIO) there were—ayes 1, noes 219.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Woodruff, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 2733. An act to authorize the construction, operation, and maintenance by the Secretary of the Interior of the Canadian River reclamation project, Texas.

CANADIAN RIVER RECLAMATION PROJECT, TEXAS

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 2733) to authorize the construction, operation, and maintenance by the Secretary of the Interior of the Canadian River reclamation project, Texas, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert "That, for the purposes of irrigating land, delivering water for industrial and municipal use, controlling floods, providing recreation and fish and wildlife benefits, and controlling and catching silt, the Secretary of the Interior, acting pursuant to the Federal reclamation laws (act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388, and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto), is authorized to construct, operate, and maintain the Canadian River reclamation project, Texas, described in the report of the Commissioner of Reclamation approved by the Secretary May 3, 1950, entitled 'Plan for Development, Canadian River Project, Texas,' project planning report No. 5–12.22–1, at an estimated cost of $86,656,000, the impounding works whereof shall be located at a suitable site on the Canadian River in that area known as the Panhandle of Texas. In addition to the impounding works, the project shall include such main canals, pumping plants, distribution and drainage systems, and other works as are necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act. The use by the project of waters arising in Ute and Pajarito Creeks, N. Mex., shall be only such use as does not conflict with use, present or potential, of such waters for beneficial consumptive purposes in New Mexico.

"SEC. 2. (a) Notwithstanding any recommendations in the above-mentioned report to the contrary, only the costs of construction allocable to flood control and, upon approval by the President of a suitable plan thereof, to the preservation and propagation of fish and wildlife, and operation and maintenance costs allocable to the same purposes, shall be nonreimbursable.

"(b) Actual construction of the project herein authorized shall not be commenced, and no construction contract awarded therefor, until (1) the Congress shall have consented to the interstate compact between the States of New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Texas agreed upon by the Canadian River Compact Commission at Santa Fe, N. Mex., December 6, 1950, in conformity with Public Law 491, Eighty-first Congress, and (2) repayment of that portion of the actual cost of constructing the project which is allocated to municipal and industrial water supply and of interest on the unamortized balance thereof at a rate (which rate shall be certified by the Secretary of the Treasury) equal to the average rate paid by the United States on its long-term loans outstanding at the time the repayment contract is negotiated minus the amount of such net revenues as may be derived from temporary water supply contracts or from other sources prior to the close of the repayment period, shall have been assured by a contract satisfactory to the Secretary, with one central repayment contract organization, the term of which shall not exceed 50 years from the date of completion of the municipal and industrial water supply features of the project as determined by the Secretary.

"(c) The repayment contract shall provide, among other things, (1) that the holder thereof shall have a first right, to which right the rights of the holders of any other type of contract shall be subordinate, to a stated share or quantity of the project's available water supply for use by its constituent industrial and municipal water users during the repayment period and a permanent right to such share or quantity thereafter subject to payment of such costs as may be incurred by the United States in its operation and maintenance of any part of the project works; (2) that, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary may prescribe, the care, operation, and maintenance of such portions of the pipeline and related facilities as are used solely for delivering such water to the contract holder, and its constituent organizations shall, as soon as is practicable after completion of the municipal and industrial water supply features of the project, pass to the contract holder or to an organization which is designated by it for that purpose and which is satisfactory to the Secretary; and (3) that title to such portions of the pipeline and related facilities shall in like manner pass to the contract holder or its designee or designees upon payment to the United States of all obligations arising under this act or incurred in connection with the project.

"SEC. 3. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be required to carry out the purposes of this act."

Mr. GUILL. Mr. Speaker, the spirit of cooperation prevailed today in the House of Representatives and in the other body. They extended to the Panhandle of Texas the opportunity to, some day, realize a dream that will eventually culminate in the construction of the Canadian River dam. The efforts of many men have been put forth in trying to make this dream become a reality. I think this is the time to commend each of them individually, and the people of the Panhandle of Texas can thank the teamwork in the House and the Senate for making this legislation possible.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire of the majority leader as to the program of next week?

Mr. McCORMACK. On Monday we will have the call of the Consent Calendar, and if any of the following bills do not pass by unanimous consent, they will be taken up under suspension of the rules:

H. R. 9802, granting succession to the War Damage Corporation. That bill comes from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

H. R. 9900, vocational rehabilitation of the armed services, extending Public Law 16, for those in the service now.

H. R. 9911, the Servicemen's Indemnity Act of 1950.

H. R. 8848, a bill providing for a survey of the prisoners of World War II, the effects of undernourishment, and so forth, upon them.

I shall ask unanimous consent that it be in order to consider, on Monday, District bills, and if granted, there will be two bills.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman can do that now.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday next it may be in order to consider District bills.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. The first District bill is Senate Joint Resolution 209, the District rent-control bill, extending it in conformity with the national action.

S. 1122, to amend the code relating to children born out of wedlock.

Tuesday is undetermined, but I have no knowledge of any legislation on that date.

On Wednesday we will take up H. R. 9798, the civilian-defense bill. I talked with the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services. He expected it to be reported out Monday by his committee and asked me to bring it up Wednesday, which I am doing.

Then there is a public-works bill, H. R. 9893, coming out of the Committee on Armed Services. Chairman VINSON gave me the same information relative to that bill.

Thusday and Friday are undetermined. Any further program will be announced later, although at this time I know of none.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Can the gentleman tell us what the program is for Christmas?

Mr. McCORMACK. I will come to that. Conference reports, of course, may be called up at any time.

In relation to Christmas: The best information I can get on the tax bill in the Senate is that it will be reported out of the Senate committee tomorrow, the report to be filed in the Senate on Monday, with the intention, as I understand, of bringing it up Tuesday. How long it will be debated there, of course, I cannot state; I would not undertake to. But it is hoped that if they get through Wednesday or Thursday at the latest, it will go to conference. If the conference report is not agreed upon by Friday of next week, then it is the intention to bring it up on January 1 and to adjourn from Friday of next week until Tuesday of the following week, from Tuesday until Thursday and from Thursday until January 1.

I have no knowledge of any legislation that would come up the week after next. I think it advisable for us to adopt that procedure even if we could adjourn, say, on Friday next. I think it is perhaps the better procedure for the Congress to be in session rather than taking an adjournment sine die in the light of the situation as it exists.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. When will the conference on the appropriation bill that we just passed be apt to come up?

Mr. McCORMACK. Probably the chairman can tell us.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. That, of course, will depend on action taken by the Senate. As soon as the Senate messages it back, we will immediately go to conference. That should not be long. I take for granted that will be before the Christmas holidays.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is the best information I can give at the moment, and it is definite. I like to be as definite as I possibly can when giving information to the House.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 26 (D) (6) OF INTERNAL REVENUE CODE

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 9794) to amend section 26 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Section 22 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code be amended as follows:

"(A) Adjustment of net income and resulting tax—years beginning prior to January 1, 1948: If, for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1940, and prior to January 1, 1948, the closing inventory of a taxpayer inventorying goods under the method provided in this subsection reflects a decrease from the opening inventory of such goods for such year, and if the taxpayer elects, at such time and in such manner and subject to such regulations as the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may prescribe, to have the provisions of this paragraph apply, and if it is established to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, in accordance with such regulations, that such decrease is attributable to the involuntary liquidation of such inventory as defined in subparagraph (C), and if the closing inventory of a subsequent taxable year, ending prior to January 1, 1956, reflects a replacement, in whole or in part, of the goods so previously liquidated, the net income of the taxpayer otherwise determined for the year of such involuntary liquidation shall be adjusted as follows:

"(i) Increased by an amount equal to the excess, if any, of the aggregate cost of such goods reflected in the opening inventory of the year of involuntary liquidation over the aggregate replacement cost; or

"(ii) Decreased by an amount equal to the excess, if any, of the aggregate replacement cost of such goods over the aggregate cost thereof reflected in the opening inventory of the year of the involuntary liquidation.

The taxes imposed by this chapter and by chapter 2 for the year of such liquidation, for preceding taxable years, and for all taxable years intervening between the year of liquidation and the year of replacement shall be redetermined, giving effect to such adjustments. Any increase in such taxes resulting from such adjustments shall be assessed and collected as a deficiency but without interest, and any overpayment so resulting shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer without interest."

SEC. 2. Section 22 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by the addition of the following:

"(B) Adjustment of net income and resulting tax—years beginning after June 30, 1949: If, for any taxable year beginning after June 30, 1949, and prior to January 1, 1954, the closing inventory of a taxpayer inventorying goods under the method provided in this subsection reflects a decrease from the opening inventory of such goods for such year, and if the taxpayer elects, at such time and in such manner and subject to such regulations as the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may prescribe, to have the provisions of this paragraph apply, and if it is established to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, in acordance with such regulations, that such decrease is attributable to the involuntary liquidation of such inventory as defined in subparagraph (D), the net income of the taxpayer otherwise determined for the year of such involuntary liquidation and for the year of replacement shall, with respect to goods involuntarily liquidated, be adjusted as follows:

"(i) Adjustment of net income for the year of involuntary liquidation: (a) Increased by an amount equal to the excess, if any, of the aggregate cost of such goods reflected in the opening inventory of the year of involuntary liquidation over the aggregate replacement cost of such goods for the year of involuntary liquidation; or (b) decreased by an amount equal to the excess, if any, of the aggregate replacement cost of such goods for the year of involuntary liquidation over the aggregate cost thereof reflected in the opening inventory of the year of involuntary liquidation; and

"(ii) Adjustment of net income for the year of replacement: (a) Increased by an amount equal to the excess, if any, of the aggregate replacement cost of such goods for the year of liquidation over the aggregate replacement cost thereof for the year of replacement; or (b) decreased by an amount equal to the excess, if any, of the aggregate replacement cost of such goods for the year of replacement over the aggregate replacement cost of such goods for the year of liquidation.

As used in this subparagraph, the term "aggregate replacement cost" for the year of involuntary liquidation means the average cost of goods of the kind involuntarily liquidated that were purchased, manufactured, or otherwise produced by the taxpayer during such year or, in the absence of such cost for the year of liquidation, the average cost of such goods purchased, manufactured, or otherwise produced in the latest preceding taxable year in which such purchase, manufacture, or production occurred. If, in any taxable year, goods involuntarily liquidated have been partially replaced and an adjustment has been made for such replacement under subdivision (ii) of this subparagraph, no further adjustment shall be made under subdivision (ii), of this subparagraph with respect to such replaced goods, unless in a year following such partial replacement there has occurred an involuntary liquidation to which the provisions of this subsection are applicable. If the closing inventory of the taxpayer for the last taxable year ending prior to January 1, 1956, does not reflect a complete replacement of the goods involuntarily liquidated, the net income of the taxpayer otherwise determined for the year of involuntary liquidation shall be further adjusted, with respect to the goods not replaced, as follows:

"(iii) Increased by an amount equal to the excess, if any, of the aggregate replacement cost of such goods for the year of involuntary liquidation over the aggregate cost thereof reflected in the opening inventory of the year of involuntary liquidation; or

"(iv) Decreased by an amount equal to the excess, if any, of the aggregate cost of such goods reflected in the opening inventory of the year of involuntary liquidation over the aggregate replacement cost of such goods for the year of involuntary liquidation. The taxes imposed by this chapter and by chapter 2 for the year of liquidation, for preceding taxable years, for the year of replacement, and for all taxable years intervening between the year of liquidation and the year of replacement, shall be determined or redetermined, as the case may be, giving effect to the adjustments prescribed in this paragraph. Any increase in such taxes resulting from adjustments to net income under subdivisions (iii) and (iv) of this subparagraph shall be assessed and collected as a deficiency but any overpayment so resulting shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer without interest."

SEC. 3. That section 22 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code be amended as follows:

"(C) Definition of involuntary liquidation—years beginning prior to January 1, 1948: The term "involuntary liquidation," as used in this subparagraph, means the sale or other disposition of goods inventoried under the method described in this subsection, either voluntary or involuntary, coupled with a failure on the part of the taxpayer to purchase, manufacture, or otherwise produce and have on hand at the close of the taxable year in which such sale or other disposition occurred such goods as would, if on hand at the close of such taxable year, be subject to the application of the provisions of this subsection, if such failure on the part of the taxpayer is due, directly and exclusively, (i) to enemy capture or control of sources of limited foreign supply; (ii) to shipping or other transportation shortages; (iii) to material shortages resulting from priorities or allocations; (iv) to labor shortages; or (v) to other prevailing war conditions beyond the control of the taxpayer."

SEC. 4. That section 22 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code be amended as follows:

"(D) Definition of involuntary liquidation—years beginning after June 30, 1949: The term 'involuntary liquidation,' as used in this subparagraph, means the sale or other disposition of goods inventoried under the method described in this subsection, either voluntary or involuntary, coupled with a failure on the part of the taxpayer to purchase, manufacture, or otherwise produce and have on hand at the close of the taxable year in which such sale or other disposition occurred such goods as would, if on hand at the close of such taxable year, be subject to the application of the provisions of this subsection, if such failure on the part of the taxpayer is primarily due, directly or indirectly, (i) to foreign governmental restriction of sources of limited foreign supply; (ii) to shipping or other transportation shortages; (iii) to material shortages resulting from priorities, allocations, or Government stockpiling programs; (iv) to labor shortages; (v) to inability because of material shortages to purchase in the customary manner at established prices; (vi) to seizure, or an exercise of the power of requisition or condemnation or the threat or imminence thereof; (vii) to disruption of normal trade relations between countries; (viii) to fires, storms, shipwreck, floods, droughts, crop blights, epidemics, or other casualty, or to theft; or (ix) to other conditions beyond the control of the taxpayer."

SEC. 5. That section 22 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code be amended as follows:

"(E) Replacements: If, in the case of any taxpayer subject to the provisions of subparagraph (A) or subparagraph (B), the closing inventory of the taxpayer for a taxable year, subsequent to the year of involuntary liquidation but prior to the complete replacement of the goods so liquidated, reflects an increase over the opening inventory of such goods for the taxable year, the goods reflecting such increase shall be considered, in the order of their acquisition, as having been acquired in replacement of the goods most recently liquidated (whether or not in a year of involuntary liquidation) and not previously replaced, and if the liquidation was an involuntary liquidation shall be taken into purchases and included in the closing inventory of the taxpayer for the year of replacement at the inventory cost basis of the goods replaced.

"(F) Election irrevocable: An election by the taxpayer to have the provisions of this paragraph apply, once made, shall be irrevocable and shall be binding for the year of the involuntary liquidation and for all determinations for prior and subsequent taxable years insofar as they are related to the year of liquidation or replacement.

"(G) Adjustment in certain cases: If the adjustments specified in subparagraph (A) are, with respect to any taxable year, prevented, on the date of the filing of the income-tax return of the taxpayer for the year of the replacement, or within 3 years from such date, by any provision or rule of law (other than this subparagraph and other than sec. 3761, relating to compromises), such adjustments shall, nevertheless, be made if, in respect of the taxable year for which the aljustment is sought, a notice of deficiency is mailed or a claim for refund is filed, as the case may be, within 3 years after the date of the filing of the income-tax return for the year of replacement. If the adjustments specified in subdivisions (iii) or (iv) of subparagraph (B) are, with respect to any taxable year, prevented, on the date of the filing of the income-tax return of the taxpayer for the last taxable year ending prior to January 1, 1956, or within 3 years from such date, by any provision or rule of law (other than this subparagraph and other than sec. 3761, relating to compromises), such adjustments shall, nevertheless, be made if, in respect of the taxable year for which the adjustment is sought, a notice of deficiency is mailed or a claim for refund is filed, as the case may be, within 3 years after the date of the filing of the income-tax return for the last taxable year ending prior to January 1, 1956. If, at the time of the mailing of such notice of deficiency or the filing of such claim for refund, the adjustment is so prevented, then the amount of the adjustment authorized by this paragraph shall be limited to the increase or decrease of the tax imposed by this chapter and chapter 2 previously determined for such taxable year which results solely from the effect of subparagraph (A) and subparagraph (B), and such amount shall be assessed and collected, or credited or refunded, in the same manner as if it were a deficiency or an overpayment, as the case may be, for such taxable year and as if, on the date of the filing of the income-tax return for the year of the replacement or (if subdivision (B) is applicable) for the last taxable year ending prior to January 1, 1956, as the case may be, 3 years remain before the expiration of the periods of limitation upon assessment or the filing of claim for refund for the taxable year. The tax previously determined shall be ascertained in accordance with section 734 (d). The amount to be assessed and collected under this paragraph in the same manner as if it were a deficiency or to be credited or refunded in the same manner as if it were an overpayment shall not be diminished by any credit or set-off based upon any item, inclusion, deduction, credit, exemption, gain, or loss, other than one resulting from the effect of subparagraph (A) or subparagraph (B). Such amount, if paid, shall not be recovered by a claim or suit for refund, or suit for erroneous refund based upon any item, inclusion, deduction, credit, exemption, gain, or loss, other than one resulting from the effect of subparagraph (A) or subparagraph (B)."

Mr. CAMP. Mr. Speaker, I offer a committee amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. CAMP: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That section 22 (d) (6) (relating to the involuntary liquidation and replacement of elective inventories) of the Internal Revenue Code is hereby amended as follows:

"(a) By amending the title of subparagraph (A) thereof to read as follows:

"'(A) Adjustment of Net Income and Resulting Tax.—Years beginning prior to January 1, 1948.'

"(b) By striking out in subparagraph (A) thereof 'January 1, 1951' and by inserting in lieu thereof 'January 1, 1953.'

"(c) The amendments made by this section shall be applicable with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1940.

"SEC. 2. Liquidations in taxable years beginning after December 31, 1949, and prior to January 1, 1954.

"(a) In general: Section 22 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code is hereby amended by the addition of the following subparagraph:

"'(F) Years Beginning After December 1, 1949, and prior to January 1, 1954.

"'(i) Adjustment of net income and resulting tax: If, for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1949, and prior to January 1, 1954, the closing inventory of a taxpayer inventorying goods under the method provided in this subsection reflects a decrease from the opening inventory of such goods for such year, and if the taxpayer elects, at such time and in such manner and subject to such regulations as the Commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may prescribe, to have the provisions of this paragraph apply, and if it is established to the satisfaction of the Commissioner, in accordance with such regulations, that such decrease is attributable to the involuntary liquidation of such inventory as defined in subparagraph (B) (as modified by clause (ii) of this subparagraph), and if the closing inventory of a subsequent taxable year, ending prior to January 1, 1956, reflects a replacement in whole or in part, of the goods so previously liquidated, the net income of the taxpayer otherwise determined for the year of such involuntary liquidations shall be increased by an amount equal to the excess, if any, of the aggregate cost of such goods reflected in the opening inventory of the year of involuntary liquidation over the aggregate replacement cost, or decreased by an amount equal to the excess, if any, of the aggregate replacement cost of such goods over the aggregate cost thereof reflected in the opening inventory of the year of the involuntary liquidataion. The taxes imposed by this chapter and by chapter 2 for the year of such liquidation, for preceding taxable years, and for all taxable years intervening between the year of liquidation and the year of replacement shall be redetermined, giving effect to such adjustments. Any increase in such taxes resulting from such adjustments shall be assessed and collected as a deficiency but without interest, and any overpayment so resulting shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer without interest.

"'(ii) Definition of involuntary liquidation: For the purposes of this subparagraph the term "involuntary liquidation" shall have the meaning given to it in subparagraph (B) and, in addition, it shall mean a failure, as referred to in that subparagraph, on the part of the taxpayer due, directly and exclusively, to disruption of normal trade relations between countries. For the purposes of this subparagraph the words "enemy" and "war," as used in subparagraph (B), shall be interpreted pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary, in such a way as to apply to circumstances, occurrences, and conditions, lacking a state of war, which are similar, by reason of a state of national preparedness, to those which would exist under a state of war.

"'(iii) Application of subparagraphs (C) and (E): Subparagraphs (C) and (E), to the extent that they refer to any taxpayer subject to the provisions of subparagraph (A) or to the adjustments specified in or resulting from the effect of subparagraph (A), shall be as applicable to a taxpayer subject to the provisions of this subparagraph or to adjustments specified in or resulting from the effect of this subparagraph as though they specifically referred to this subparagraph. For this purpose, and with respect to the taxable years covered by this subparagraph, the reference in subparagraph (E) to section 734 (d) shall be taken as a reference to section 450 (d).'

"(b) Effective date: The amendment made by this section shall be applicable with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1949."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING CHAPTER 26 OF THE INTERNAL REVENUE CODE

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 553) amending chapter 26 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER: Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That chapter 26 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by adding at the end of subchapter E a new section designated 3183 to read as follows:

"SEC. 3183. National emergency transfers of distilled spirits.

"(a) Transfers permitted: Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, distilled spirits of any proof, including alcohol (the term 'distilled spirits' or 'spirits' as hereinafter used in this section shall include alcohol) may be removed in bond in approved containers and pipe lines from any registered distillery including a registered fruit distillery (such registered distillery and registered fruit distillery hereinafter referred to as 'distillery'), internal revenue bonded warehouse, industrial alcohol plant, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse to any distillery, internal revenue bonded warehouse, industrial alcohol plant, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse for redistillation, or storage, or any other purpose deemed necessary to meet the requirements of the national defense: Provided, That any such distilled spirits may be stored in approved tanks in, or constituting a part of, any internal revenue bonded warehouse or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse: Provided further, That any such distilled spirits removed to an industrial alcohol plant or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse may be withdrawn therefrom if of a proof of 160 degrees or more for any tax-free purpose, or upon payment of tax for any purpose, authorized by part II of subchapter C; and any such distilled spirits removed to a distillery or internal revenue bonded warehouse may be withdrawn therefrom if of a proof of 160 degrees or more for any tax-free purpose authorized by part II of subchapter C or for any purpose authorized in the case of like spirits produced at a distillery: Provided further, That any such distilled spirits, upon removal from a distillery or internal revenue bonded warehouse for transfer to an industrial alcohol plant or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse or for any tax-free purpose authorized by part II of subchapter C, shall be subject to the provisions of part II of subchapter C: Provided further, That when any distilled spirits are removed under the provisions of this section to a distillery, industrial alcohol plant, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse, the tax liability of the proprietor of the distillery, internal revenue bonded warehouse, industrial alcohol plant, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse from which the spirits are removed, and the liens on such distillery, industrial alcohol plant, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse, shall cease; and at and from the time the distilled spirits leave the distillery, internal revenue bonded warehouse, industrial alcohol plant, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse the tax shall be the liability of the proprietor of, and the liens shall be transferred to the premises of, the distillery, industrial alcohol plant, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse to which the distilled spirits are transferred: Provided further, That when any distilled spirits are removed under the provisions of this section to an internal revenue bonded warehouse the proprietor of such warehouse shall be primarily liable for the tax on the spirits at and from the time the spirits leave the premises from which transferred: Provided further, That the provisions of section 2901 of the Internal Revenue Code shall apply in respect of losses of any distilled spirits transferred, or removed for transfer, under this section to a distillery or internal revenue bonded warehouse; and the provisions of section 3113 of the Code shall apply in respect of losses of any distilled spirits transferred, or removed for transfer, under this section to an industrial alcohol plant or industrial alcohol bonded warehouse: And provided further, That sections 2836, 2800 (a) (5), and 3250 (f) of the Internal Revenue Code shall not apply to the redistillation of such spirits at a distillery nor shall section 2870 of the code apply to the removal of such spirits from any distillery or internal revenue bonded warehouse.

"(b) Exemption from statutory requirements: The Secretary may temporarily exempt proprietors of distilleries, internal revenue bonded warehouses, industrial alcohol plants, or industrial alcohol bonded warehouses from any provision of the internal revenue laws relating to distilled spirits, except those requiring payment of the tax thereon, whenever in his judgment it may seem expedient to do so to meet the requirements of the national defense. Whenever the Secretary shall exercise the authority conferred by this subsection he may prescribe such regulations as may be necessary to accomplish the purpose which caused him to grant the exemption.

"(c) Termination of section: The authority conferred upon the Secretary by this section shall expire 5 years from the date of enactment of this section."

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under existing law the Government may and is presently withdrawing beverage distilled spirits for emergency industrial use in connection with the increased production of synthetic rubber. However, under existing law there is no provision for the transportation in bond, the storage, the denaturalization or distillation of these spirits under internal revenue supervision after the withdrawal free of tax for use in the defense program. House Joint Resolution 553 will make possible the utilization for industrial purposes of distilled spirits produced at beverage distilleries as provided for during World War II. It is of the utmost importance that this be done in order to safeguard the continuation of our production of synthetic rubber.

INCOME TAXES

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 554) amending section 3804 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 3804 of the Internal Revenue Code is hereby amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) Additional time to be disregarded: In the case of an individual serving in the Armed Forces of the United States, or serving in support of such Armed Forces, in an area designated by the President of the United States by Executive order as a 'combat zone' for the purposes of section 22 (b) (13), at any time during the period designated by the President by Executive order as the period of combatant activities in such zone for the purposes of such section, or hospitalized outside the States of the Union and the District of Columbia as a result of injury received while serving in such an area during such time, the period of time disregarded under this section, notwithstanding the limitations of subsections (a) and (c), shall include the period of service in such area, plus the period of continuous hospitalization outside the States of the Union and the District of Columbia attributable to such injury, and the next 180 days thereafter."

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this joint resolution is to suspend the time limitations with respect to the performance of acts required under Federal tax laws, including the filing of income-tax returns and the payment of Federal income taxes, where such performance is impracticable or impossible by reason of the service by an individual in the Armed Forces of the United States or in support of such Armed Forces in a combat zone.

The period of time to be so disregarded is the period of service in the combat zone, plus the period of continuous hospitalization attributable to injury received during service in the combat zone, and the next 180 days thereafter.

Under existing law the Commissioner of Internal Revenue does not have the authority to authorize general extensions of time for filing income tax returns and making payment of income taxes by members of the Armed Forces serving in Korea. Since some members of the armed services now in Korea would, under existing law, be required to file an amended declaration by January 15, 1951, prompt enactment of the joint resolution is imperative.

ESTIMATED TAXES

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9913) to prevent penalties and additions to tax in case of failure to meet requirements with respect to estimated tax by reason of increases imposed by the Revenue Act of 1950.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 145 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to penalties with respect to failure to file returns, pay tax, etc.,) is amended by adding after subsection (e) a new subsection (f), as follows:

"(f) In the case of taxable years beginning prior to October 1, 1950, and ending after September 30, 1950, the penalties prescribed by this section shall not be applicable if the taxpayer failed to meet the requirements of section 294 (relating to substantial underestimate of estimated tax), by reason of the increase in tax on individuals imposed by the Revenue Act of 1950."

SEC. 2. Subparagraph (2) of subsection (d) of section 294 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by adding at the end of subparagraph (2) a new sentence reading as follows: "In the case of taxable years beginning prior to October 1, 1950, and ending after September 30, 1950, the additions to tax prescribed by this subsection shall not be applicable if the taxpayer failed to meet the 80-percent and 66⅔-percent requirements of this section by reason of the increase in tax on individuals imposed by the Revenue Act of 1950."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That section 145 of the Internal Revenue Code (relating to penalties with respect to failure to file returns, pay tax, etc.) is amended by relettering subsection (e) as subsection (f) and by adding after subsection (d) a new subsection (e), as follows:

"'(e) In the case of taxable years beginning prior to October 1, 1950, and ending after September 30, 1950, the penalties prescribed by this section shall not be applicable if the taxpayer failed to meet the requirements of section 294 (d) (2) (relating to substantial underestimate of estimated tax), by reason of the increase in normal tax and surtax on individuals imposed by section 101 of the Revenue Act of 1950.'

"SEC. 2. Paragraph (2) of subsection (d) of section 294 of the Internal Revenue Code is amended by adding at the end of paragraph (2) a new sentence reading, as follows: 'In the case of taxable years beginning prior to October 1, 1950, and ending after September 30, 1950, the additions to tax prescribed by this subsection shall not be applicable if the taxpayer failed to meet the 80-percent and 66⅔-percent requirements of this paragraph by reason of the increase in normal tax and surtax on individuals imposed by section 101 of the Revenue Act of 1950.'"

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, the present law requires a taxpayer to estimate his income in advance and pay the tax currently. If during the year he finds that he has underestimated his tax, the law contains provisions for filing an amended estimate. If a taxpayer fails to estimate and pay an amount which is equal to 80 percent of the tax finally found to be due, he is subject to a penalty.

H. R. 9913 provides in substance that if the taxpayer's estimate or declaration is in an amount sufficient to be 80 percent of the tax that would be found due under the tax rates that existed prior to the increase in rates provided in the Revenue Act of 1950, that no penalty will be assessed.

The purpose of this act is to make it unnecessary for a taxpayer to file an amended estimate or declaration if his declaration already filed would not be subject to penalty under the tax rates that existed prior to the 1950 Revenue Act. The passage of this measure will save trouble and expense for millions of taxpayers. It will mean a saving of considerable sums to the Government in that these amended estimates will not have to be received and processed. There will be no loss in revenue to the Treasury. The additional amount of taxes due from an individual will be paid when he files his final return on or before March 15.

AMENDMENT OF SECTION 313 (B) OF THE TARIFF ACT OF 1930

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 8344) to amend section 313 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 313 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930 be amended to read as follows:

"(b) Substitution for draw-back purposes: If imported duty-paid sugar; nonferrous metal; ore containing nonferrous metal; flaxseed and/or linseed, and oil, and duty-free or domestic merchandise of the same kind and quality are used in the manufacture or production of articles within a period not to exceed 1 year from the receipt of such imported merchandise by the manufacturer or producer of such articles, there shall be allowed upon the exportation of any such articles, notwithstanding the fact that none of the imported merchandise may actually have been used in the manufacture or production of the exported articles, an amount of draw-back equal to that which would have been allowable had the sugar; nonferrous metal; ore containing nonferrous metal; flaxseed and/or linseed, and oil, used therein been imported; but the total amount of draw-back allowed upon the exportation of such articles, together with the total amount of draw-back allowed in respect of such imported merchandise, under any other provision of law, shall not exceed 99 percent of the duty paid on such imported merchandise."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 7, strike out "flaxseed and/or linseed, and oil", and insert "flaxseed and linseed, and flaxseed and linseed oil."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JENKINS: On page 2, line 7, strike out "flaxseed and/or linseed, and oil", and insert "flaxseed and linseed, and flaxseed and linseed oil."

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, as reported out unanimously by the Committee on Ways and Means, the committee amendment at page 1, line 7, applies on page 2, line 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

YUGOSLAV EMERGENCY ASSISTANCE ACT

Mr. PRIEST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the managers on the part of the House may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill S. 4234.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

EMERGENCY RELIEF ASSISTANCE TO YUGOSLAVIA—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. RICHARDS submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (S. 4234) to promote the foreign policy and provide for the defense and general welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia.

CANADIAN RIVER RECLAMATION PROJECT, TEXAS

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I take this one-fourth minute in order to express my deepest gratitude to the Speaker and to Chairman J. HARDIN PETERSON, of the House Committee on Public Lands, and to Mr. MCCORMACK, the majority leader, and to Speaker JOE MARTIN, the minority leader, and to Mr. CRAWFORD and Mr. D'EWART, and all members of the Committee on Public Lands and to the House membership on both sides of the aisle for the favorable action taken today on the conference report on H. R. 2733, the bill providing for the Canadian River project in the Panhandle-Plains area of Texas.

The House approved this measure on August 4, 1949, the bill having been introduced by our former colleague, Hon. Gene Worley, and piloted through the House by him and myself.

The Senate having taken favorable action today, I am pleased to see the House concur in the final version of the bill and I believe that this project will prove to be in the best interests of the Panhandle-Plains area of Texas and the country as a whole. Thanks very much.

SENATE

MONDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1950

(Legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Immanuel, God with us, again by Thy grace the journeying months have brought us near to the shining glory of the holy night. Amid the tumult and terror of man's inhumanity to man, we hear anew the tidings of the angels' song and the music that is not of earth.

May an understanding sympathy that knows no boundaries of border or race find lodging even in bitter hearts hardened by cynicism. May a longing for purity that sees God and the Godlike on the common earth be born in minds stained by unhallowed thoughts. Save us from a festivity that knows nothing of receptivity and from decoration that forgets dedication. May the holly of this joyous season enshrine the holy, and its crimson beads be but emblems of the myrrh of sacrifice, the gift of contrite hearts. We ask it in the name of Bethlehem's Babe. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On the request of Mr. LUCAS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Friday, December 15, 1950, was dispensed with.

EXTENSION OF INSTITUTIONAL ON-FARM TRAINING—RESOLUTION OF RICHLAND COUNTY (WIS.) BOARD OF SUPERVISORS

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have received this morning from J. R. Annear, county clerk for Richland County, Wis., a resolution adopted by the board of supervisors of that county on November 1, 1950, pertaining to the vital subject of institutional on-the-farm training for veterans. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution 10

Resolution pertaining to petitioning Congressmen and Senators of this State to extend institutional on-farm-training law

The benefits to participating veterans of institutional on-farm training have been proven beyond doubt; and

The demand for such training has exceeded the facilities for training and it is certain that hundreds of veterans actively engaged in farming who have appreciated their need for training and have made application for such training will fail to find enrollment by the deadline of July 25, 1951: Therefore be it

Resolved, That whatever steps may be necessary should be taken to grant to those veterans who (1) are actively engaged in farming, (2) have made request for institutional on-farm training, (3) have had their farms surveyed by the nearest instructor in on-farm training, and who (4) have had their individual petition for training considered and approved by their local veterans training committee before July 25, 1951, the status of having been registered for on-farm training and the privilege of entering training on the earliest date training facilities can be provided them, even though such date be subsequent to July 25, 1951, but providing further that all training shall terminate July 25, 1956, per terms of the present law; be it further

Resolved, That the deadline date of July 25, 1951, be extended to include institutional, on-the-job, and apprentice training; be it further

Resolved, That the clerk mail copies of this resolution to the Congressmen from the Third Congressional District and to both Wisconsin United States Senators so that they may be acquainted with the desires of said board.

E. R. KELLER,
ALVA E. MILLER,
GEORGE SMART,
TED JACOBSON,
M. C. KINTZ,
Agriculture Committee.

INCREASE IN LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES BY COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, from the Committee on Armed Services, I report favorably an original resolution, increasing the limitation of expenditures for hearings and investigations by the Committee on Armed Services.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received, and, under the rule, referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

The resolution (S. Res. 375) was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved, That the first section of Senate Resolution 93, Eighty-first Congress, agreed to June 22, 1949, increasing the limitation of expenditures for hearings and investigations by the Committee on Armed Services, is amended by striking out "December 31, 1950," and inserting in lieu thereof "January 31, 1951.".

ARREST OF WITNESSES WHOSE TESTIMONY IS REQUIRED BY SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE INTERSTATE CRIME—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE—MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, from the Committee on the Judiciary, I report the resolution (S. Res. 368) requiring the issuance of warrants of arrest for certain persons desired as witnesses before the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, with a recommendation that the resolution be referred to the Special Committee To Investigate Organized Crime in Interstate Commerce, and I submit a report (No. 2639) thereon. Accompanying the report are minority views of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], which I ask may be printed with the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar, and, without objection, the report will be printed as requested by the Senator from Nevada.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

(Mr. SALTONSTALL introduced Senate bill 4261, to exempt members of the Armed Forces from the tax on admissions when admission is free of charge, which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. BUTLER:

S. 4262. A bill to prevent penalties and additions to tax in case of failure to meet requirements with respect to estimated tax by reason of increases imposed by the Revenue Act of 1950; to the Committee on Finance.

EXEMPTION FROM CERTAIN TAXES BY MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I introduce for appropriate reference a bill which would exempt the payment of the excise tax by members of the Armed Forces in uniform in the case of an admission free of charge to an entertainment. I do this because I believe that when the person or people giving an entertainment contribute the tickets the Federal Government should be willing to relax the requirement that such free tickets be taxed in the case of men in uniform.

Perhaps the tax should be taken off on all admissions for our men now in uniform and in hospitals, but I certainly believe that the bill which I now send to the desk is a proper approach at the present time for the benefit of our boys in the services.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred.

The bill (S. 4261) to exempt members of the Armed Forces from the tax on admissions when admission is free of charge, introduced by Mr. SALTONSTALL, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED

The following bills and joint resolutions were severally read twice by their titles, and referred, as indicated:

H. R. 9920. An act making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

H. R. 9802. An act to grant succession to the War Damage Corporation; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

H. R. 8344. An act to amend section 313 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930;

H. R. 9794. An act to amend section 22 (d) (6) of the Internal Revenue Code;

H. R. 9913. An act to prevent penalties and additions to tax in case of failure to meet requirements with respect to estimated tax by reason of increases imposed by the Revenue Act of 1950;

H. J. Res. 553. Joint resolution amending chapter 26 of the Internal Revenue Code; and

H. J. Res. 554. Joint resolution amending section 3804 of the Internal Revenue Code; to the Committee on Finance.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following favorable report of a nomination was submitted:

By Mr. McCARRAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

John W. Gibson, of Michigan, to be a member of the Displaced Persons Commission.

BERNARD F. ELMERS—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. President, I submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 4803) for the relief of Bernard F. Elmers, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4803) for the relief of Bernard F. Elmers, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same with amendments as follows: Page 1, line 3, strike out "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the funds appropriated for the International Refugee Organization"; Senate amendment numbered 1, in lieu of the sum inserted by the Senate amendment insert

"$12,500"; amendment numbered 2, restore the language "personal injuries and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

HARLEY M. KILGORE,
WARREN G. MAGNUSON,
ALEXANDER WILEY,
Managers on the Part of the Senate.

WILLIAM T. BYRNE,
WINFIELD K. DENTON,
KENNETH B. KEATING,
Managers on the Part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the report?

Mr. WHERRY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask a question. Does the conference language reduce the amount involved?

Mr. KILGORE. No; the conference language increases the amount allowed by the Senate. The conferees were convinced, after conferring with the House, that the House amount as originally allowed was correct, and the conferees agreed to go along with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

There being no objection, the report was considered and agreed to.

A PLEA FOR NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for 4 minutes on a matter which I believe will be of considerable interest to all Members of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Tennessee is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that Senators be seated, to listen to what I have to say; and I thank them heartily for doing so.

Mr. President, for many years the New York Times has printed in its Sunday edition a section entitled "The News of the Week in Review." I buy that newspaper every Sunday, primarily in order to read that section. Whoever prepares it has a master mind. In my opinion, yesterday's section was the best review ever published by that newspaper. I doubt that it could be improved upon. I know that I could not improve upon it. It should be read by every Senator and by every Member of the House of Representatives. It is most regrettable that in this time of trouble and distress it cannot be read by every American citizen. It describes the far eastern situation, the European troubles, the Russian aggression, and does so succinctly, concisely, and accurately, just as I believe those situations to be.

At this point in my remarks, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, all of the front page of section 4 of yesterday's edition of the New York Times and the first column and one-half of page 2–E of that section.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEWS OF THE WEEK IN REVIEW AS PRESIDENT TRUMAN ACTS TO MEET THE CHALLENGE OF COMMUNISM

MOBILIZATION TO MEET THE CHALLENGE

The United States moved last week to meet fully the challenge of international communism. Yesterday, for the second time in a decade, while the United States was not yet at war, a national emergency was proclaimed. Once again the most powerful Nation on earth is to mobilize, to build a mighty armed force, to serve as the arsenal for its allies.

The challenge for the United States last week was undiminished. In Korea the massed forces of Communist China struck savagely in an effort to complete the defeat of American troops fighting under the United Nations banner.

In Europe, the western countries are virtually defenseless in the face of overwhelming Russian might. This week the top diplomatic official of the United States, Secretary of State Dean Acheson, is to meet in Brussels with the Foreign Ministers of the other Atlantic Pact countries. The mission is to launch a real rearmament of the Continent.

In a radio address to the Nation on Friday night, the President spelled out the challenge to the United States and its allies in the strongest terms. Mr. Truman said:

"Danger has been created by the rulers of the Soviet Union. * * * The forces of Communist imperialism burst out into open warfar in Korea. [The Communists] have shown that they are now willing to push the world to the brink of a general war to get what they want. This is the real meaning of the events that have been taking place in Korea. That is why we are in such grave danger."

UNITED STATES ACTS—A STATE OF EMERGENCY

The last time a national emergency was proclaimed in the United States was in May 1941. The British, with their dominions, were fighting alone against the dictators; the Germans were in process of driving them to a "little Dunquerque" from Crete. On the 27th—the day the Royal Navy gave Britain something to cheer about by sinking the battleship Bismarck—President Franklin D. Roosevelt said in a fireside chat:

"We will not accept a Hitler-dominated world. * * * I have tonight issued a proclamation that an unlimited national emergency exists."

The proclamation put America's mobilization into second speed; half a year later, with Pearl Harbor, it was to shift into high. In the peak years the Nation was to devote to war as much as $90,000,000,000—nearly half of the National product then—and two-thirds of its industrial capacity. As many as 400,000 young men a month were drafted into the Armed Forces until they totaled more than 13,000,000.

Last Friday night, with America once again the main hope of the free world, President Harry S. Truman said:

"We cannot yield to aggression. * * * I will issue a proclamation tomorrow morning declaring that a national emergency exists."

Mr. Truman's proclamation served notice that it was time for the mobilization against the Communist threat to move into second speed. The question of whether or when the time will arrive for a high-speed mobilization is, of course, the question of a big war.

The President acted at the end of a week in which the sense of urgency in the Capital rose rapidly. At the beginning of the week he held important meetings with Democratic congressional leaders and with his civilian advisers on mobilization. On Wednesday and Thursday he and his highest councilors conferred in extraordinary sessions with congressional chieftans of both parties. There appeared to be broad agreement that in the light of Korea and its implications the Nation must take drastic action—action in military mobilization and in economic mobilization.

ON THE MILITARY FRONT

At the outbreak of the Korean war the United States Armed Forces totaled about 1,450,000 men. Many of these were tied down in various assignments—occupation duty in Germany and Japan, antiaircraft defense of the United States, assignments to schools. On K-day there were only four divisions in the United States that could be sent out of the country.

The Armed Forces now are believed to total around 2,300,000 (the exact figures are secret). National Guard units and Reservists of all three service branches have been called up. For the Army, 210,000 men will have been drafted by the end of this month. Still the shortage of military manpower is extremely acute.

The defense budget has expanded much more rapidly. At K-day it was about $13,000,000,000. Congress has rapidly expanded the figure. A bill being rushed through Congress will put the total close to $42,000,000,000.

On Friday night Mr. Truman said:

"We are expanding our Armed Forces very rapidly. * * * Our next step is to increase the number of men and women on active duty to nearly three and a half million. * * * At the same time we will have a very rapid speed-up in the production of military equipment."

The President's words left much room for speculation about the Government's precise military objectives. According to informed observers, the picture is something like this:

As to manpower, the figure of 3,500,000 used by Mr. Truman indicates an expansion of about 1,200,000. About 21,000 of these will be in 2 National Guard divisions which, it was announced, will be called up in January. The only clues he gave on how long the total expansion would take were that the Army and Navy build-up would take a few months while the Air Force would take somewhat longer. Earlier in the week the Army gave another clue by asking Selective Service for 160,000 men in January and February instead of the 90,000 previously scheduled.

New rules for draft?

Moreover, new draft targets are thought likely to require changes in the draft law and regulations. Theoretically the law provides a draft reservoir of about 8,500,000 men between ages 19 and 26. But many of these are unfit. The law exempts veterans and gives deferments to certain students. The regulations are generous in granting deferments for married men, fathers, and essential workers.

As a result only about 1,000,000 are considered draftable. An additional 500,000 men come into draft age each year. But the feeling is that too little leeway is left for further expansion, if needed. Accordingly the administration may tighten up on deferments and ask Congress to amend the law—by, for example, broadening the age limits, extending the length of service from 21 to 24 months, and cutting down on exemptions.

As to military expenditure, the budget is expected to rise further—perhaps to $50,000,000,000—before the fiscal year ends next June 30. Where it will go from there Mr. Truman did not say. As one indication, however, he said that "within 1 year" from now plane production will quintuple and combat-vehicle production will quadruple.

Mr. Truman stressed that the mobilization was to rearm not only the Unites States but also the western Allies. Yesterday the State Department showed that the field of American concern is still broader by proposing a special conference of the foreign ministers of 21 American Republics.

ON THE ECONOMIC FRONT

Two world wars and the threat of a third have given the President a wide range of extraordinary powers. Notably there is the Second War Powers Act of 1917, amended in 1942. It still holds since World War II still is on officially. Under this and other laws the President has controls over shipping, communications, radio stations, and other fields. There also is the Defense Production

Act of 1950, enacted last September because of the Korean war. Under it the President has powers to control inflation and make sure defense production gets done.

Up to now Mr. Truman has followed a go-slow policy in using his powers. They have been delegated widely throughout the administration.

The general overseer, as Coordinator of Mobilization, has been W. Stuart Symington, Chairman of the National Security Resources Board. There is a new Economic Stabilization Agency under Alan Valentine, in charge of price and wage controls; it has scarcely functioned. In the Commerce Department there has been a National Production Authority under William H. Harrison; among other things it has fixed quotas on the nonmilitary use of critical materials.

The Federal Reserve Board has restricted bank, consumer, and real-estate credit. The Labor Department has been dealing with manpower; Agriculture, food and farm machinery; Interior, fuels and power; the Interstate Commerce Commission, transportation. Collaterally, Congress has enacted higher income taxes for individuals and corporations, and an additional tax on corporate excess profits is in the works.

Voluntary controls tried

In this set-up two of the President's most drastic powers have been held in abeyance. The Defense Production Act permits him to impose price and wage ceilings—either generally or in selected industries, so long as wage controls accompany price controls. The administration has shied away from them on the ground that voluntary restraints should be given a chance to work.

In recent weeks the pressure for rigid controls has rapidly gathered force. Much of organized labor has won wage increases; these often have been followed by price increases. There have been fears that the wage-price spiral might get out of hand. The critical turn in world events, and the prospect of a far more strenuous American mobilization, have brought a general conviction that stricter controls are in order. If a clincher were needed, it came last Wednesday when General Motors, Ford, and eight other auto firms, asked by Mr. Valentine to withhold price increases on their cars voluntarily, said flatly "No"—higher labor and materials costs made price hikes necessary.

On Friday night Mr. Truman said:

"We can handle this production program, but it will require hard work. It will require us to make a lot of changes in our ordinary ways of doing things. * * * [It] will inevitably push up prices, unless we take positive action to hold them down."

In his speech the President spelled out the specific steps—and yesterday he began the process of putting them into action. These are the steps:

As to organization, Mr. Truman brought the entire economic mobilization under the central control of a new Office of Defense Mobilization. It will have charge of production, procurement, manpower, transportation, and economic stabilization. Its head, formally appointed yesterday, is Charles Edward Wilson, 64, president of General Electric for 11 years who was Vice Chairman of the War Production Board in World War II. (He is not to be confused with Charles Erwin Wilson, president of General Motors, who calls himself "Engine Charley" and his namesake "Electric Charley.")

Mr. Wilson will be free to decide whether to run the mobilization through scattered agencies as now or to merge them into a single agency. He will thus be a czar to a degree no man was in World War II. The closest approximation in that war was James F. Byrnes, who as head of the Office of War Mobilization and Reconversion was called assistant president, but acted mainly as an umpire of interagency disputes.

Ceilings—and autos

As to controls, Mr. Truman said there would be moves at once to control prices of a number of materials and products. Wage controls will go along with the price controls. In addition, Mr. Truman said he would put before Congress still further taxes in order to help prevent inflation and put defense "as nearly as possible on a pay-as-you-go basis."

Last night the Economic Stabilization Agency issued the first price-ceiling order in the new program—and the first since OPA. It rolled auto prices back to the levels of December 1—before the recent increases. They will hold there until March 1, pending a thorough study of auto prices. Meanwhile ESA will study auto-wage stabilization. More price ceilings in other lines are expected to come.

Thus America is to live again, in some measure, the still-fresh memories of a mobilized economy—the shortages, the substitutes, the regulations, the longer working hours and, above all, the young men going away.

The President's proclamation yesterday served not only a legal purpose (it will add a few to his many powers) but also the psychological purpose of driving home to the people the need for the sacrifices ahead. For its part the Nation seemed united in its response to his call:

"I summon all citizens to make a united effort for the security and well-being of our beloved country."

NO QUARTER ON KOREAN BATTLEFIELDS

In Korea the United Nations army is split into two segments separated by 200 miles. Except where UN troops are in firm contact with the enemy, the tactical situation is obscure. It is hidden in a security silence which Tokyo headquarters imposed on Thursday to cloak troop movements. But the strategical picture is clear.

In the south, somewhere along the thirty-eighth parallel, units of Lt. Gen. Walton H. Walker's Eighth Army are deployed in strong points commanding the roads. This staggered defense line stretches from the west coast to the central mountain range. Defenses have also been mounted around the Inchon-Seoul area. Between the parallel and Pyongyang, the capital of North Korea, the Chinese commander, Lin Piao, is massing at least 150,000 men for an attack down the center of the peninsula which is designed to outflank and encircle the UN defenses.

In the northeast Maj. Gen. Edward M. Almond's Tenth Corps holds a narrow beachhead—its radius is less than 6 miles—around the port of Hungnam. Transports are tied up at the piers. Off shore stands the Seventh Fleet. Overhead, Marine and naval fighters are flying cover. Posted around the perimeter is a United States infantry division, fighting off probing attacks and determined to hold the line against an assault by 100,000 Chinese troops which is expected at any minute. The Tenth Corps is being evacuated. The evacuation has been going on all week. How many of the corp's 60,000 men are still in the beachhead is not known.

UN plans secret

What are the future plans of the United Nations high command? These, also, are a closely guarded secret. But one thing is clear. The Chinese Communists now have more than 300,000 men in Korea. In addition, there are nearly 100,000 North Korean troops, already operating in guerrilla bands or in reorganized units behind the front. Against this Communist mass, General MacArthur has 275,000 men.

If Mao's commander in Korea, Lin Piao, throws the full weight of his divisions across the thirty-eighth parallel, it will probably be impossible for the United Nations to hold a defense line across the whole width of the peninsula at the parallel.

It may be that the UN commander will decide to set up beachheads based upon Pusan in the south and Inchon in the west. Ringed with dug-in tanks and heavy artillery, covered by the big guns of the fleet and protected by air power, these beachheads could be held for some time, and could be reduced only at tremendous cost. Furthermore, both Inchon and Pusan—especially the latter—provide good facilities for evacuation if a final withdrawal becomes necessary.

The major fighting last week took place in the northeast. A week ago today Task Force Dog from the United States Third Division crashed through a Chinese roadblock deep in a gorge along the road between Hungnam and Hagaru, and linked up with the Marines and GI's that had fought their way out of the trap around the Changjin Reservoir. Men of the rescuing task force cut left and right of the road and held off 4 Chinese divisions coming in for the kill. Puerto Rican soldiers manned the heights along the canyon. The trucks carrying the Marines and GI's swept through. Last Monday night all the trapped force—between 20,000 and 25,000 men—was safe within the Hungnam beachead. The next morning their rescuers joined them.

Evacuation begins

There was little time to lose. Three strong Chinese columns were surging down upon the beachhead—one along the coast, one behind the marines from Changjin Reservoir, a third between them. Last Wednesday the booms started swinging the tanks and trucks from the piers onto the waiting Victory and Liberty ships; soldiers moved up the gangways. Landing craft and launches put off from the fleet moored in the roadstead—the battleship Missouri, several cruisers, five flattops, a large number of destroyers, and auxiliary craft—to pick up more men. As the men were evacuated the outposts began pulling in.

A few hours before dawn on Friday morning came the dread beating of drums and blowing of bugles that herald a Chinese attack. An enemy force of 2,500, including Mongolians on ponies, hit the defense line west of Hungnam. The Chinese objective was the Hungnam airfield. There was bloody hand-to-hand fighting. Two United States platoons—about 100 men—were cut off; one of them was feared lost. Reinforcements were rushed in and the Communists were thrown back. One thousand Chinese lay dead in front of the UN line.

But all day Friday the pressure continued. On Saturday morning UN troops pulled out of the large industrial city of Hamhung, 6 miles northwest of Hungnam, as engineers blew the bridges and drove engines and railway cars into the chasm.

The Third Division, manning the perimeter, is confident it can hold until the evacuation is completed. Then the last rear guards will make a dash for the nearby airstrip and board the waiting planes. The Tenth Corps will have been saved.

NO COMPROMISE IN UN DIPLOMACY

The first Chinese Communist mission to the United Nations—a group of seven men and two women headed by General Wu Hsiu-chuan—arrived at Lake Success 23 days ago. Officially the Chinese came to discuss their charge that the United States' action in throwing a naval blockade around Formosa constituted armed aggression against the Chinese Peoples Republic. But far more than that, General Wu used the UN forum to repeat Russia's bitter denunciations of the United States and the western democracies and to present far-reaching demands. He said, in effect: Get out of Korea. Get out of Formosa. Give us China's seat at the UN.

In private talks with perhaps a dozen delegates, talks initiated in an effort to end the intervention of Communist China—General Wu has been equally tough. All proposals made to him have met the same response: He nodded and agreed to transmit them to his government.

Wu to the press

Yesterday, for the first time, General Wu called a press conference. He called it in order to announce Peiping's answer to a cease-fire proposal the UN General Assembly had approved. General Wu, in effect, rejected the cease fire. Later it was disclosed that General Wu and his delegation plan to leave Lake Success this week.

The press conference came after a week of United Nations attempts to end the Korean war. These attempts turned on what kind of truce might be acceptable to both sides. The Chinese Communists had demanded what would amount to a "conditional cease-fire." Their price was a definite commitment that the United States would allow Peiping to take Formosa. The United States wanted an unconditional cease-fire. The United States position was that, once the Korean war was ended, we would discuss Formosa in the United Nations—but we would not negotiate at the point of a gun.

On Monday, at Lake Success, a group of Asian and Mideastern delegates led by India's Sir Benegal Rau drafted a package plan of two resolutions which they hoped would constitute a framework for reconciliation of the Chinese and American views. Resolution No. 1 proposed a three-man committee, including Assembly President Nasrollah Entezam of Iran, to "determine the basis on which a satisfactory cease-fire in Korea can be arranged." Resolution No. 2 called for appointment of a committee including the United States and possibly Communist China to draft plans for a general Far Eastern settlement—including Formosa's future status.

Only the first resolution came up for debate last week and only the Russian bloc opposed it. Russia's Jacob Malik called it an "Anglo-American device" designed to give the United States time to regain strength for further aggression. His opposition seemed to indicate that Moscow was pushing China to continue the war.

Entezam, Rau, Pearson

On Thursday the Assembly approved the resolution, 52 to 5. President Entezam then named the two other members of the cease-fire committee—Sir Benegal and Lester Pearson of Canada. On Friday they started sounding out the Americans and the Chinese Communists. On Friday evening General Wu conferred with UN Secretary General Trygve Lie for more than an hour. There were reports that General Wu had threatened to go back to Peiping unless the UN took up the Formosa problem immediately.

This was the background for yesterday's press conference, which was held in the Security Council chamber at Lake Success. General Wu read a four-page statement. He called the cease-fire proposal a trap; he said its real purpose was to tie [our] hands. But he said: "We are willing to try to advise the Chinese volunteers to bring to an early conclusion the military operations which they have been forced to undertake together with the [North] Korean People's Army in their resistance against the United States Armed Forces of aggression."

The Peiping delegation is to fly home on Tuesday. But despite their departure, efforts to work out some kind of cease-fire will continue—if not in the UN, then elsewhere.

AND NOW EUROPE—TO BUILD WEST'S DEFENSES

In Brussels, March 17, 1948—three weeks after the Communist coup in Czechoslovakia pushed Russia's sphere westward—five Western European countries signed an alliance. They were: Great Britain, France, Belgium, the Netherlands, and Luxembourg. The paper they signed said that if any treaty member were attacked all would come to the victims defense. Actually, the five countries had little in the way of military power to put into the field.

In Brussels, tomorrow and Tuesday, there will take place a meeting of the members of a greatly expanded western alliance—the Atlantic pact. The foreign ministers of these countries will attend: the United States, Canada, the five Brussels pact countries, Italy, Portugal, Norway, Denmark, Iceland. The harsh fact is that, while the alliance has grown in numbers, the western powers have not got the armies to put up a serious defense of Western Europe. Russia's devisions, vastly outnumbering the West, could sweep quickly to the Atlantic and the English Channel.

What the pact members hope to accomplish at the Brussels Conference meetings, and at supplementary meetings, is to bring about a real rearmament of the West—including Western Germany. The idea is to provide a deterrent to a march of the Red Army. While the West could never build up enough armed strength to stop the Russians dead in event of war, it could build up a powerful force—powerful enough to show the Russians that an invasion of Western Europe would be a very costly affair. Thus, the theory goes, western rearmament may hold off the Russians.

Foreign ministers prepare

Last week the pact foreign ministers made careful preparations for the Brussels conference. In Washington Secretary of State Dean Acheson, despite the demands of the Korean crisis, spent much time on the European defense problem. Experts briefed him. He read papers—some by John McCloy, United States High Commissioner in Germany—on the German troop question. He held long consultations on the question of Soviet intentions in Europe. Mr. Acheson leaves today by plane.

Mr. Acheson and his colleagues will have before them, for final approval, agreements already worked out by their lieutenants on three major aspects of western defense.

First, there is the general plan for a coordinated Atlantic defense force made up of the national armies of pact countries.

Second, there is the plan for a supreme commander of the Allied Atlantic force. The Ministers are expected to call on the United States to provide that commander. It is a foregone conclusion that he will be Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower.

Third, there is the plan—a most controversial plan—for bringing Germans into the defense of Western Europe. It is a compromise plan between the views of the United States and France.

Original positions

Originally the United States argued that Europe could be defended only if strong German forces participated. It urged that 10 German divisions (a division is a self-contained military unit) be recruited for service in the Atlantic Force under orders of the Supreme Commander. France shrank from the idea. Her attitude stemmed from her deep-seated fear of rebirth of German military power; and an increasing fear that the reappearance of German divisions on the borders of Eastern Europe would provoke the Russians into marching. Last Wednesday in London, the pact minister's subordinates put the final touches on the compromise plan. The plan, in essence, is this.

About 150,000 German troops would be recruited under Allied supervision. They would be divided not in divisions but in regimental combat teams of not more than 6,000 soldiers each. These teams would be assimilated into divisions of the pact powers. While this process of recruitment goes on, France would try to work out a decision with other continental powers on a French project for a solution of the German rearmament question. The project is for a European army in addition to the regular armies of the pact nations. The European army would have divisions made up of three combat teams each—one team French, another German, the third other European nationals.

Because of the harmony reported from London last Wednesday, there were many statements to the effect that the German rearmament question was at last settled. That may be true as far as the United States and France and the other pact nations are concerned, but it is far from true as far as Western Germany is concerned. The United States and its Allies have a big selling job ahead of them, for the West Germans do not like the compromise plan at all.

Mood of Germans

This is the West Germans' attitude: They fear a war in which the decisive battles very likely would be fought on German soil. They feel that a defense force under the compromise would be too weak. Many Germans are saying that they would rather be bolshevized than fight a war they could not win. That is the line of the Socialist Party in West Germany. But the Socialists would be willing to rearm—if rearmament were not hobbled by the conditions of the Allied plan. They want German divisions—in effect, a new German Army—and the commitment of very powerful American forces as proof that the west seriously intends to defend Germany. They want that—or no rearmament at all.

In recent state elections in West Germany, the Socialists, campaigning on their rearmament positions, made heavy gains at the expense of the Christian Democrats, the party of Konrad Adenauer, Chancelor of West Germany. Last Tuesday the Adenauer government took the Socialist position. A government spokesman said the Atlantic Pact compromise plan was unacceptable; that Germans would go along with rearmament only on the basis of full equality with the pact powers. Full equality would mean not only German divisions, but, for all practical purposes, complete sovereignty for West Germany.

The Russian question

At the Brussels Conference the pact ministers will discuss the question of what to do about the German attitude toward rearmament—and the Russian attitude. The Russians are engaged in an intense campaign to head off the rearmament of West Germany. Last October the Kremlin (which has allowed partial rearmament of East Germany), warned the United States, Britain, and France that the Soviet Union would not tolerate western rearmament. Maybe that statement means what it implies—that Russia would march if West Germany started to rearm—and maybe it is a bluff. But in any case that warning, and others like it, have had the effect of increasing fear among west Europeans—Germans included—of German rearmament. Apparently the Russians hope that fear will bring paralysis of the defense effort in the west. The Americans, in discussions with the west Europeans, have put emphasis on the United States stockpile of atomic bombs as a deterrent to Russia, at least as long as the present superiority in atomic weapons exists. But the Europeans are not so sure.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, perhaps I should stop here; but, because I believe our country to be in perhaps the greatest danger it has ever experienced, I am going to add a few words.

Mr. President, in my judgment, dangerous as our foreign enemies may be, our greatest danger lies here at home. Our greatest danger lies in the dissension and differences that I see constantly increasing. I have served in one or the other of the two Houses of Congress for a period of nearly 40 years. During that long period of time I do not believe I have ever seen the Members of this body and the Members of the other body, or the people generally, ever working at such cross purposes. I do not believe I have ever seen them so critical of one another. I do not believe I have ever known our people, both in the Government and out of it, to be more critical, nor have I ever seen them show such utter disregard in many respects for our Constitution and laws. I do not believe I have ever read in our history of such a mix-up in world affairs as exists today.

Our possessions have been invaded, and our rights have been violated by other nations—nations, incidentally, as all of us know, to which we have been exceedingly kind, in fact, more than exceedingly kind, indeed to some of them we have been more kind than any other nation ever has been to another. Yet today we do not really know on which side any of these nations will be if the present troubled developments in the world lead to conflict.

All of this should make the citizens of the United States stay together and work only for our common country. The purpose of this short statement, Mr. President, is to urge each and every one of my colleagues, each and every American citizen, to stay together in this time of trouble. This is no time for dissension; it is no time to permit ourselves to become worked up over lesser questions and lesser matters. To my mind, it is our supreme moment; it is our greatest test.

The questions before us are, "Shall the greatest Constitution ever written and the greatest government ever devised by man and the freest and most successful and most prosperous people on earth, remain as presently set up; or are we to be taken over by Communists who believe neither in God nor in man? I pray to a just God that the answer to the last question will be no.

As my colleagues know, I am critical at times. I am not excusing myself. I do not blame others, including some Senators for being critical. But, Mr. President and fellow Senators, men with whom I have been associated for so long, and for whom I have such great respect, at this time of peril to our Government and of peril to our people, let us withhold our criticisms and dissensions until a more propitious occasion. Each one of us held up his hand before Almighty God and took an oath to defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic.

As all of us know, we cannot change our Government overnight; we cannot change our officials overnight, though a change can be made, of course, by means of impeachment in the House of Representatives and trial by the Senate. But the President of the United States, Mr. Truman, is our President, and will remain President until January 1953. In everything we do or say to discredit him we are helping the Russians, although not intentionally, of course. Nevertheless, regardless of whatever our intentions may be or whatever our forgetfulness may be, the fact remains that we are helping the Russians when we pursue that course.

If we are forced into a war Mr. Truman will still be our Commander in Chief during that war. Whatever critics may say, we in the Senate who have served in this body with our President know that he is honest, we know that he is able, we know that he is courageous, and we know that he has the power to appoint his executive officers, by and with the consent of the Senate.

Let me remind the Senate that everyone of these officers, some of whom are being criticized, was confirmed by our vote. We were for them, as the President was. We took part in it, as he did. He has appointed these officers, and we have approved them and have consented to their appointment. Some of them may not do just what we would have them do. Some of them have made mistakes. We all make mistakes. But let us get together behind our President and behind our Government. Let us build up our Army, our Navy, our Marine Corps, our Air Corps, and all our other defenses. I pray you, my colleagues, do not let it be said of us that it was during our service that the United States lost her first great conflict. Let us forget politics, forget differences, forget everything except that our Government and our people, and even our religion are in danger. Let us be united in the conflict which apparently is before us. I appeal personally to Senators, who constitute part of the greatest legislative body that has ever existed among men. I fear I have trespassed upon them, but I thank them with all my heart for the fine attention they have given me.

CONFERENCES BETWEEN THE PRESIDENT AND PRIME MINISTER ATTLEE

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, has the routine business been completed?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there are no further formal or routine matters, the Senator from Arkansas is recognized. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Missouri to proceed to the consideration of the resolution (S. Res. 371) calling for a report on the discussions between the President of the United States and Prime Minister Attlee.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Arkansas will yield, we on this side of the aisle have no objection to permitting that motion to come up and making the resolution the pending business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion will be agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, what was the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request was that the motion to take up the resolution offered by the Senator from Missouri be agreed to, and that the resolution be placed before the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield for that purpose?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. With the understanding that I may get the floor again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Senator from Arkansas yields for that purpose. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas to refer the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I have no disposition to object to a reference of the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, if there can be some understanding that it be reported back to the Senate promptly. Time is of the essence in the consideration of this resolution, if the session is permitted to expire with nothing done about the resolution it will be an idle and a futile thing.

The purpose of the resolution is very plain. It is to prevent another Yalta or another Potsdam, at which were made, on behalf of the American people, important agreements that will affect the American people for generations to come. Those agreements were not referred to the Senate but were consummated by the Executive Department of the Government in secret.

The resolution merely asks for a full and complete report of what was done at the recent conference between Mr. Attlee and Mr. Truman, and it asks that any agreements entered into at the conference should, under the Constitution, be embodied in a treaty which should be submitted to the Senate for ratification or rejection.

Mr. President, at the time the resolution was proposed I suggested to the distinguished Senator from Texas, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, that there be some understanding that the resolution be reported either favorably or unfavorably at some definite time. He was not agreeable to that course. I hope he will reconsider and permit the resolution to be referred with some understanding as to the time at which it may be reported. It does not require extensive hearings. It involves merely a question of judgment. Every Member of the Committee is thoroughly advised as to the facts and circumstances of the underlying law. I hope that an understanding can be reached that the resolution shall go to the Committee on Foreign Relations and be reported in sufficient time to be acted upon at the present session.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has no power individually to pledge what the committee is going to do. That is why I proposed the resolution be referred to the committee, so as to let the committee decide when and if it wants to act on the resolution.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. In a moment.

I took that course instead of the course which is sometimes taken of introducing a bill or resolution and demanding that the committee act on it day after tomorrow.

I now yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the Senator if I have failed to make myself clear? The suggestion was that the resolution be referred to the committee with a request, or with a direction, that it be reported on a day certain. I was not under the illusion that the chairman of the committee could bind the committee in that respect, but I think the Senate can do so. It can refer the resolution to the committee with instructions. There is nothing unusual about that. That was done in the case of the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] a few days ago in regard to subpenaing some witnesses to appear before his subcommittee. There was general agreement, as I recall, that the resolution should go to the committee with instructions to report within a certain definite period. That is all we are asking in this instance, not that the chairman shall undertake to bind the committee with reference to anything, but merely that he agree that the Senate may direct the committee to report within a certain time.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, evidently I misunderstood the Senator, because he said he had no objection to the resolution being referred to the committee with the understanding, and so forth. Whose understanding?

Mr. KEM. The understanding of the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. There is nothing in the resolution with reference to that.

So, Mr. President, I insist on my motion that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations without any handicap, but leaving it to the fair judgment of the committee just as every other resolution or bill is left. Why should we choose this particular time to violate the rules which give every committee the opportunity to consider any measure which is referred to it? Let the committee consider it. Why should the Senator from Missouri direct what the Committee on Foreign Relations should or should not do?

I insist on my motion to refer the resolution to the committee, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has the Senator from Texas concluded?

Mr. CONNALLY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Frear	Kem
Anderson	Fulbright	Kerr
Brewster	George	Knowland
Butler	Gurney	Langer
Carlson	Hayden	Leahy
Chapman	Hendrickson	Lehman
Chavez	Hickenlooper	Long
Clements	Hill	Lucas

Mundt	Saltonstall	Watkins
Murray	Smith, Maine	Wherry
Neely	Smith, N. J.	Wiley
Nixon	Smith, N. C.	Williams
O'Conor	Stennis	Young

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum is present.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I move that the motion of the Senator from Texas be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

That the committee be instructed to report the resolution back to the Senate not later than Thursday, December 21, 1950.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. KEM] to the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators who favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] will vote "yea" when their names are called; those opposed to the amendment will vote "nay."

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. Would the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri require the Committee on Foreign Relations to report to the Senate by Thursday of this week, or Thursday of next week?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee would be required to report to the Senate not later than Thursday, December 21, 1950. That is this week.

Mr. LUCAS. I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment. It is a very important amendment. The resolution is very important. The Committee on Foreign Relations should not be pushed with such rapidity. Probably it would involve some hearings to dispose of the resolution. No doubt witnesses would have to be called from the State Department. It seems to me it is very short notice, and I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I very earnestly urge Senators to vote against the amendment. The Senate is busy with the tax bill, and we have other important matters before us. Members of the Committee on Foreign Relations are also members of other committees which require their attendance at hearings. The resolution is a very important one. The Senator from Missouri would give the committee directions not only what it should do but when it should do it. The Senator's amendment would force the committee to report to the Senate by December 21, which will be next Thursday. I appeal to Senators to vote down the amendment to the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered. Those who favor the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to the motion of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] will vote "yea" when their names are called; those who oppose the motion will vote "nay." The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. LUCAS. I announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are necessarily absent.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] are unavoidably detained on official business.

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GREEN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business, having been appointed a delegate from the Senate to attend the meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in Australia.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. HUMPHREY] is absent because of illness.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPARKMAN] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business as a representative of the United States to the fifth session of the General Assembly of the United Nations.

I announce also that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS] is paired on this vote with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL]. If present and voting, the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "nay," and the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea."

I announce further that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KILGORE] is unavoidably detained on official business, and if present would vote "nay."

Mr. SALTONSTALL. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. CAIN] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] are absent by leave of the Senate.

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. FERGUSON] is absent by leave of the Senate on official business, having been appointed as a delegate from the Senate to attend the meeting of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in Australia.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICKER], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] are necessarily absent. If present and voting, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. FLANDERS] would vote "yea."

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES] is absent on official business, and if present and voting would vote "yea."

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. SCHOEPPEL] who is detained on official business is paired on this vote with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS]. If present and voting, the Senator from Kansas would vote "yea" and the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "nay."

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. TOBEY] is detained on official business of the Committee on Crime Investigation, and if present would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 45, as follows:

So Mr. CONNALLY's motion was agreed to, and the resolution (S. Res. 371) was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPUBLICAN CONTRIBUTIONS TO OUR SECURITY

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, first I should like to pay a tribute to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] for the remarks he made a moment ago, and I should like to associate myself with the sentiments he so eloquently expressed. I was very much impressed by the statement made by the senior Member of this body, and I think everyone will take his remarks to heart.

Mr. President, on Saturday last, the day after the Republicans of this Congress formally condemned the Secretary of State and demanded his dismissal, the New York Times reported on the front page as follows:

> The consensus of comment reported in a London dispatch was that the Republican action had struck a severe blow against the leadership of the United States in European action for defense.

As everyone knows, Mr. Acheson was scheduled to leave, and did leave, on Sunday to attend an extremely important conference in Brussels. The purpose of this conference is to coordinate our efforts and plans with those of our allies in the North Atlantic Treaty organization. Our allies, in fact all free peoples, are looking to this Nation for leadership in our common struggle against the ever-increasing pressure of Russian aggression.

Critical decisions of far-reaching importance concerning the creation of a European defense system, the integration of national military forces, and the coordination of economic resources, must be made. This condemnation of the Secretary of State, our representative at the conference, will largely, if not completely, destroy his influence, and consequently, our Nation's influence at this conference. Certainly this action has caused confusion and uncertainty in the minds of our allies. It is a most serious matter that at a time like this we find ourselves without an effective way to counsel with our friends or to use our influence in building the united defenses of the free world, including our own. I can think of no greater tragedy to a great nation than to find itself unable to make decisions and to act in the moment of its greatest danger.

Mr. President, this attack upon Mr. Acheson is, of course, not just a personal matter between him and the Republicans. It is, in fact, an attack upon the President and his foreign policy, and will be so interpreted by the world. Everyone knows that the President, under our Constitution, has the primary responsibility for our foreign policy. Everyone knows that Mr. Acheson is not an independent agent, but, on the contrary, that he is but the instrumentality of the President in carrying into effect the foreign policy which the President determines.

Mr. President, if the Republicans desire to change our foreign policy, which I assume they do, I submit that they have approached their objective in a misguided and irresponsible manner, unworthy of a great party. Instead of a personal attack upon an individual, let them come forward with a constructive foreign policy program. They have many persuasive advocates among their members; and if their program has substance and merit, surely they can rely upon the membership of this body and the people to give their suggestions serious and sympathetic consideration. If they can persuade the majority of this body and the people that their substantive proposals are right, I have no doubt the President will modify his policies accordingly, just as this body will listen sympathetically to their proposals. This procedure is in accord with our free democratic traditions, and would, I believe, receive universal approval.

On the contrary, Mr. President, the persistence of the Republicans in pursuing a policy of character assassination as a means of bringing about changes in our policies or our Government is an extremely dangerous course to follow. It smacks of Nazi totalitarianism. It is based upon an appeal to the prejudices and emotions of men, rather than to reason. It can, if carried on, cause disruption among our allies and division among our own people.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an observation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Arkansas keeps referring to the Republicans. I think perhaps he should say—if I may make a slight correction—a majority of the Republicans.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I accept that correction. Of course the Members of this body know to whom I am referring. The action taken was the official action, as I understand, of the majority of the conference of the Republican Members of the House and of the Senate.

Mr. President, for more than a year now we have witnessed in this country an unparalleled campaign of personal vilification, irresponsible and unrestrained. The latest object of this campaign, Mrs. Anna Rosenberg, occupied many hours of the time of the Committee on the Armed Services, at a period when those men should have been giving their concentrated, profound, and undivided attention to the security of this Nation. I refer to the last 2 weeks. I cannot think of any more effective way by which our efforts to provide for our security could be sabotaged than to distract the best minds, the leaders of this Congress, the Members of our Armed Services Committee, by such false charges. I do not believe the evil geniuses of the Kremlin can devise a more effective way to paralyze us than to induce our leaders, in the Congress and in the executive branch of our Government, to spend their time and energies in a frenzied examination of false charges against our own citizens. If a stranger from Mars should read our press during the past year, it probably would never occur to him that the real enemies of this country are in Moscow, rather than Washington.

Mr. President, I do not for a minute wish to leave the impression that I think our foreign policy has been faultless or that constructive criticism should be withheld by the opposition. I, for one, welcome temperate and pertinent advice and suggestions as to what is the proper course for us to pursue. My point is simply that to attack the patriotism and character of persons with whom one may disagree, rather than the ideas and policies involved, is unjustifiable and irresponsible, and dangerous to our security.

Mr. President, I appeal to the thoughtful and responsible members of the minority party to reflect that, in this dangercus period, with the majority, as small as it is—and as small as it will be in the next Congress—the administration, as never before needs their sympathetic support. I am confident that the people of this country will, during the next 2 years, recognize and appreciate the contribution to our security that the minority may make. Working together, I am sure we can prevail against the ruthless aggression of Russia. Divided and suspicious of one another, no one can predict what may happen.

Suspicion and hatred and distrust have a way of spreading like a plague. Once they are aroused, they are not easy to eradicate. If the infection spreads too far and too deep, such confusion and distrust may increase to such an extent that only a man on horseback can control the situation.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does the Senator wish me to yield?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I thought the Senator had completed his remarks, and I wanted to make some observations.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas yields the floor. The Senator from California.

Mr. KNOWLAND. Mr. President, it is not my intention to prolong the discussion which has been advanced by the Senator from Arkansas. I merely wish to point out, however, that during the Republican Eightieth Congress the Senate and Members of the Senate on this side of the aisle gave overwhelming support to the foreign policy of our country. It was under the leadership of the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] that the Greek-Turkish aid program, and the ECA program got under way. When the North Atlantic Pact was before this body, it had the overwhelming support of Members on both sides of the aisle. The arms implementation legislation, each time it has been before this session and the previous session, has had the overwhelming support of Members on both sides of the aisle.

I believe that the Senator from Arkansas is mistaken when he tries to make the point that the resolution which was adopted by both the minority Members of the House and of the Senate, was directed to the personality of the individual concerned. I believe that Mr. Acheson unfortunately may find himself in a situation somewhat parallel to that in which the former Prime Minister of Great Britain, Mr. Chamberlain, found himself at the outbreak of World War II. It will be recalled that Mr. Chamberlain had participated in the Munich conference.

I have no doubt now, and have never had any doubt, that Mr. Chamberlain sincerely believed that by appeasing the Nazis at Munich, he was gaining some time. He at that time perhaps did not believe Hitler would violate his agreements, and that appeasement, then as now, was but surrender on the installment plan. But with the benefit of the retrospect of history, we know that appeasement is not the road to peace.

Many of us on this side of the aisle have supported the foreign policy of this Government in Europe bec use we have felt that that policy made sense. It was to enable the rehabilitation of war-torn Europe so that a vacuum would not be created into which would flow the forces of international communism. I think all Americans, regardless of partisan affiliation, recognized the fact, after a short time, that economic assistance alone would not solve the problem, because the Soviet Government and international communism are determined to press for any soft spot. Therefore, when the President of the United States proposed a Greek-Turkish-aid program to withstand that type of pressure, not only with economic help but with military aid, that program—and I cite the record, and I challenge the Senator from Arkansas to dispute it—had the overwhelming support of Members on this side of the aisle as well as on the other side of the aisle. No party has any monopoly on patriotism.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. KNOWLAND. I shall yield in a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I shall be glad to yield at the conclusion of my remarks. The oath which the Members on this side of the aisle took to protect and defend the Constitution of the United States is no less sacred than that which was taken by Members on the other side of the aisle; and while we may have honest differences of opinion, I think that, however we vote, it is in the belief that we are serving our country to the best of our ability.

When we found that the pressures of international communism still persisted after the Berlin blockade, the North Atlantic Pact was proposed to the Senate of the United States. It had the overwhelming support of Republicans and Democrats alike. That was followed by the arms-implementation legislation as I have pointed out heretofore, which also had the overwhelming support of Republicans and Democrats alike.

I have pointed out that I think Mr. Acheson, perhaps unfortunately, found himself in the same position as that in which Mr. Chamberlain found himself after Munich. When finally the pressure by Germany became so great and Hitler violated the Munich agreement, Mr. Chamberlain brought Great Britain into the war when Germany attacked Poland. He recognized that his past policies had been a mistake, and that it was impossible to yield to appeasement and save the peace. He faced up to the problem. But I think it was apparent to everyone at that point that he was a captive of his past mistakes, and that Britain could not have had the unity which she needed in her most desperate hour, under the leadership of Mr. Chamberlain. Chamberlain had to give way for Winston Churchill, and, under Mr. Churchill, Britain obtained the degree of unity which she needed in that period.

In speaking on this question I do not claim to speak for the Republican Party, but only for myself.

As I have said, I think Mr. Acheson found himself in somewhat the same position as that of Mr. Chamberlain. It is true that Mr. Acheson was advancing a program to stop communism in Europe. That program, as I have pointed out, had the overwhelming support of both parties in the Congress. But, while he was closing the door to communism in Europe, his policies were leaving a door wide open to communism in Asia. It is on this basis that I believe there has been a strong feeling, not only in the Congress but throughout the country, that those policies were unsound for, certainly, if 1,500,000,000 people should fall into the orbit of international communism, with the vast resources of Asia, such as oil, tin, and rubber, to say nothing of the great supplies of manpower, there are some of us who honestly believe that it would be most difficult, if not impossible, to stop communism in Europe under those conditions.

Mr. President, I think we should face some of the alternatives. I have never been one of those who have maintained that we should turn our eyes to Asia alone. To the contrary, I think many of us on this side of the aisle recognize the tremendous importance of Europe, and that we must give to Europe a larger share of whatever help we can give; but our complaint has been that the State Department has underestimated the importance of Asia. Those who contend that it is possible to concentrate attention on Europe, and that at all hazards, we should risk an abject surrender if need be in Asia, in order to concentrate on Europe, are furthering a very dangerous doctrine; because, if in a far eastern Munich we are prepared to yield in Korea and in Formosa, how are we going to withstand the pressures of communism in Japan? And, if we yield in Japan, we turn over to international communism a great industrial potential second only to the Ruhr?

If we yield then in Japan, how shall we maintain a position in the Philippines? Because all the arguments which can be made about abandoning Asia insofar as Formosa and Korea are concerned, or subsequently, Japan, can be made about the danger of becoming embroiled in a situation in the Philippines. If we are prepared to surrender in the Philippines, how can we withstand communism anywhere in southeast Asia? If we are prepared to yield and surrender in southeast Asia, how can we convince the American people that we should stand in India or in Pakistan? I think the American people and Senators of the United States on both sides of the aisle are entitled to an answer from the administration as to where it is proposed to stand. Is it proposed that we shall constantly yield, until all of Asia goes, and there is such overwhelming power in the Communist orbit that it will overwhelm anything we are able to build up in Europe. It has been estimated that the Soviet Union has in Siberia about 750,000 of their troops. If they are able to protect their far-eastern flank, they will be able to transfer those troops, as Mr. Stalin did during the attacks on Moscow and Leningrad, from the Far East into Europe. That number alone is greater than the total number of troops we are talking about equipping and supplying in Western Europe to meet the onslaught of communism.

There is grave danger, many of us believe, in letting Asia go down the drain. That is the point on which some of us have differed from the foreign policy of the administration. There would have been no Korean situation, I believe, had there not been a Communist China. There would be no danger today in southeast Asia if communism had not reached the borders of Indochina. There would be no threat in Japan today if it were not for the overwhelming victory of communism in China, largely with the support of the Soviet Union at a time when the Government of the United States was turning its back on the Republic of China.

These things are a part of the history of the situation. The fact that the State Department tried to encourage a coalition with communism in China is so clear that no one can successfully dispute it. History has taught us that we cannot have coalitions with communism. It did not work in Poland, where the democratic leaders were forced to flee. It did not work in Czechoslovakia where Mazaryk's life was forfeited. It did not work in Bulgaria, where the democratic leader, Petkov, was hanged. It did not and it does not work at any other place in the world, and there is no reason to believe it would work any better in Asia than it did in Europe.

I should like to say to the able Senator from Arkansas that if a policy is devised which warrants the support of the American people, a global policy to meet a global menace, there is no question of doubt in my mind that it will receive the overwhelming support of Republicans and Democrats alike. But I do not believe we would be discharging our obligations as Senators of the United States to be rubber stamps for either the present administration or any future Republican or Democratic administration. We have an obligation which we cannot lightly put aside.

The American people are entitled to the facts and to the truth. I have confidence that if the people know the facts, they will make sound judgments. But they have not always had the facts from this administration. For a period of 2 years the Wedemeyer report on China, which would have given information to the Congress and to the American people, which might have helped us make sound judgments, was suppressed and was denied to the American people. The Wedemeyer report on Korea has been suppressed for 3 years, and is today still suppressed.

I say, on my responsibility, as a Senator of the United States, as one of the few Senators who have had the opportunity to read that report, that, in my judgment, though I am not at liberty to disclose its contents because it is still maintained in the security classification, there is nothing in that report which, if it had been released to the American people and to the Congress, would have been detrimental to the security of the people of the United States. On the contrary, it would have put the Congress and the country on notice of some of the grave dangers involved in withdrawing our troops from Korea, or if we were to withdraw our troops from Korea, it would have put us on notice that the army of the Republic of Korea should have been better equipped than it was finally equipped by this Government when we did withdraw.

In the face of that record, in the face of the secret agreement at Yalta by which we lost the moral leadership of the world when we surrendered to the Soviet Union something which was not ours to surrender, when it was done without the consent of the American people or of the American Congress, when we took what belonged to our wartime ally and friend, the Republic of China, and give it to the Soviet Union, and, by so doing, assured Russian domination of Manchuria—I say we lost our moral leadership in the world. In the face of that record, there is room for criticism of the foreign policy of this Nation insofar as it relates to us.

When we consider the fact that in 1939 there were only 175,000,000 people within the orbit of Soviet imperialism, and when today there are more than 800,000,000 behind the Communist iron curtain, I say we do have a right to question the measure of success of our foreign policy.

Mr. President, speaking merely on my own responsibility as a Senator of the United States, I believe we would be derelict in our duty if we did not bring some of these things to the attention of the people of the United States. I stand ready today, as I have always stood ready, to support the Government of the United States in a sound foreign program. I have voted, without exception, for every proposal which has been presented, insofar as Europe is concerned, and I have parted company only when the administration tried to force a coalition with communism in Asia and when it failed to recognize the great danger to the United States of having a billion and a half persons in Asia fall into the arms of international communism.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I should like to make a few observations, if the Senator from California has yielded the floor.

Mr. KNOWLAND. I have yielded the floor.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I think the Senator from California stated that he was not present when I started my remarks. I did not intend in this speech to analyze the whole substance of our foreign policy. My particular point was with reference to the criticism by the Republicans of the Secretary of State, and I should like to make a few observations on that point.

I desire to try to straighten out the record a little bit, because I feel that the remarks of the Senator from California have slanted the entire discussion in a direction which I had not intended. There was nothing in my remarks questioning the patriotism of those who criticize or demand the resignation of the Secretary of State. I question their wisdom, especially at this time, and the appropriateness of the nature of the attack upon the Secretary. I want to point out that in our Government the Secretary of State does not play the same role as that played in England by the Prime Minister. The Secretary of State is not in the same position as that which was occupied by Mr. Chamberlain or any Prime Minister under a parliamentary system. The Secretary is the agent of the President not of the Congress. The President is comparable to the Prime Minister, but his tenure is not subject to a vote of confidence by the Congress.

In regard to the support of our foreign policy, I am disturbed by the present situation, in view of the fact the Republicans overwhelmingly supported our foreign policy a year ago. That leads me to the feeling that this attack has been based upon a false foundation. It is the same type of thing which was inspired and led by certain members of the minority party more than a year ago, which has put the relationship between the members of this body on a false and dangerous basis. I refer to the questioning of men's motives and questioning their patriotism, instead of questioning the wisdom of their policies. If the Senator's party had confined its criticism to the type of criticism which the Senator from California made in his address a moment ago, that is, questioning the wisdom of our policies, they would have every right to do so. I have great sympathy for such an approach. In fact, I welcome some constructive suggestion as to what we ought to do now.

It is true that the Senator from California and I have a different view about what happened in China. He interprets the widely publicized offer or suggestion by General Marshall that the Nationalist Government seek some kind of coalition with the Communists as an act of appeasement. I feel that there was a great weakness in the administration of Chiang Kai-shek, and that even at that time the situation was hopeless insofar as we were concerned. Furthermore, it was felt the only way to handle the situation would be to send in a full-scale army with all its equipment, and thus undertake the subjection of China. However, I firmly believe that General Marshall and our other leaders felt that in their best judgment it was a hopeless situation. Doubtless they felt that the corruption and reaction of the old Koumintang party was such that it was helpless in the struggle against the Communists.

That, however, is another phase of the problem. I am willing to discuss it, and I hope we shall have an opportunity when we can very dispassionately discuss the entire subject on its merits.

I wish to impress my point on the Senator from California and other Senators. I was questioning the wisdom of the action taken on Friday by the Republicans which may, and probably will, destroy the influence of our country in the councils of our Allies and before the world at this very critical time. The plea I was making, and which I am still making, is that at least during this critical period we act calmly and not fall to quarreling among ourselves about the patriotism of personalities who are involved in our Government. That is the main point I was seeking to make.

I was not seeking to defend every item of our foreign policy. I remind the Senator that I have had very serious differences of view with the Secretary of State. I think the Senator will recall that on ECA legislation year after year for 3 years I offered amendments of which he did not approve, and which the majority of the Senate did not support. I could refer to several such items. I do not think that our foreign policy is faultless. However, I am convinced that under present circumstances that the kind of attack to which I have referred will prove to have been a disservice to our country, to the Republican Party, and to our democratic system of government.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I should like to yield the floor. The Senator from Colorado has been very patient. However, I am glad to yield for a question.

Mr. BREWSTER. The Senator from Arkansas stated that the only way in which we could deal with the matter would be to proceed to defeat or impeach the President. Does the Senator recall the statement?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I said that if the objective is to change our foreign policy and our administration of it, it is the President and not the Secretary of State who determines the policy. The President is the equivalent of Mr. Chamberlain. If the Senator from California wishes to change our policy, it is up to the President, and not Mr. Acheson, who after all is a subordinate and subject to dismissal and control by the President.

Mr. BREWSTER. Does the Senator from Arkansas recognize the provision in the Constitution with reference to the conduct of our foreign policy with the advice and consent of the Senate?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. As to appointments and treaties, not as to the formulation of policies.

Mr. BREWSTER. Does not the Senator believe that the formulation of treaties and the appointment of personnel are matters peculiarly within the advice and consent of the Senate?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I will say to the Senator that the North Atlantic treaty, which he is seeking to implement at Brussels, was submitted to the Senate, and a majority of the Senate supported the treaty. I think it will be found that a majority of the Republican Members of the Senate have supported other major items.

Mr. BREWSTER. I understood the Senator from California to state that the North Atlantic treaty is a perfect example of a subject involving the advice and consent of the Senate. It must be remembered that its initiation came during the Eightieth Congress, when the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] presented his resolution with respect to it. Is that not correct?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I believe the origin of it was the resolution called the Vandenberg resolution, if I recall correctly.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is correct. As the Senator from California has pointed out, does not the Senator recognize that in the recent election the conduct of our foreign policy by Mr. Acheson was one of the major issues in the campaign?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. It was my impression that it was not the conduct of our foreign policy. Rather, I believe it was the character, the patriotism, and the allegiance of certain individuals to our form of government, which is the very thing I am seeking to criticize. In my opinion, such criticism is an appeal to emotions and prejudices, and not to reason. Criticism has been made on that basis, and not upon a reasonable or rational examination of the policy involved. While we had none of it in my own State, from what I have been told there was that kind of criticism in other States. It seems to me that it may be excusable for the Republican Party immediately before the election to go much further in its criticisms than it should go now when the election is over and we are confronted with a grave emergency. Certainly now, we ought to go very far in trying to get away from that type of approach to the problem.

Mr. BREWSTER. Would the Senator from Arkansas question the fact that certainly following the election it was generally considered that the results of the election indicated serious question in the minds of the people with respect to the conduct of our foreign policy.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I think that it may have well been influenced by its course; that is, whether we were doing well or not in Korea. However, I recall when the authorization to move our troops into Korea was announced it resulted in very hearty support from Republicans as well as Democrats. I believe one active Republican member of the Committee on Foreign Relations even proposed some kind of resolution endorsing our action in Korea. It is true that when reverses set in and the consequences became apparent, there was a change in sentiment. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. BREWSTER. I have one other question to ask of the distinguished Senator from Arkansas. Does he not recognize that while the Senator from Maine would have deferred action a litle longer—and, in fact, tried very earnestly to defer action—with the honest expectation that the President of the United States himself would recognize the significance of the election and the lack of confidence that seemed to be implied in the result, the Republican membership of this body had shown great moderation in waiting more than a month since the election, anticipating, as many others did, that it would mean a change in the position taken, and that it was not, apparently, until there were other definite moves made to cloak over past errors and to build up a position of carrying on with the guidance of a leader in politics which had so tragically failed, that this action finally came? Does the Senator not recognize the moderation of the Republicans in most instances, and would he not accord to us that position which I am sure we accord to him, of complete sincerity in seeking the welfare of our country? I do not believe that the misguided words of one or another in an election should be attributed to everyone concerned, particularly when we have waited a whole month before taking the action which the Senator now questions.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I wish to impress upon the Senator that I tried very carefully to refrain, and did refrain, from questioning the motives or patriotism or character of the Republicans. It is purely a question of the wisdom and timing of the statement. It is a question of the wisdom of the statement, with regard to our own effectiveness in this time of trouble. That is the distinction which I wish to impress, and that is the very distinction which I was hoping the Republican Members of both bodies would make.

It is time we quit attacking other men's motives when we disagree with their ideas. We should attack only the ideas. That is exactly the essence of the plea which I am trying to make today. The time has long passed when, every time we disagree with someone, we call him a Communist. We may say that he is stupid or that he is wrong. I take no offense at that.

The Senator knows what I am talking about. To me the experience of Anna Rosenberg was a dreadful thing. Apparently all one needs to do is to have some crackpot point a finger at someone, and the whole country is stirred into a frenzy. That is the kind of thing which I think is dangerous. If we can agree to disagree only on the level of ideas or policies, then I think there will be no trouble.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Would the Senator from Arkansas challenge the proposition that a very substantial majority of the membership on the other side of the aisle have privately and repeatedly expressed the opinion to their colleagues in this body that a change in the office of Secretary of State is now wise and desirable?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I think that is true.

Mr. BREWSTER. That, it seems to me, tells the whole story.

(The following debate, which appears at page 16896 of the daily RECORD of Tuesday, December 19, 1950, was, on request of Mr. FULBRIGHT, and by unanimous consent, ordered to be transposed and to be printed at this point in the permanent RECORD of Monday, December 18, 1950.)

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, yesterday after I had made my statement about the Republican action on Friday demanding the dismissal of the Secretary of State, the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER] asked me some questions and engaged me in debate. The Senator from Maine is an exceedingly clever man. His mind works like radar, and his tongue like lightning.

At one point in the debate, in answer to one of his interrogatories, I misinterpreted the significance of his statement, and my answer was not in accord with what I believed then, and now believe, to be the facts.

I do not believe that a majority of the Democratic Members of this body believe that the Secretary of State should be dismissed now, especially under the circumstances which the Republican Party created by its action on Friday. Certainly at that time I had no way of even estimating such a fact. I sought to correct my answer to read:

I think that is true on the other side of the aisle, but it is not true on this side of the aisle.

That expresses more accurately what I believe to be the real facts. I ask unanimous consent that this statement be transposed in the permanent RECORD so as to follow immediately my answer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection——

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I wish to be clear as to whether or not the context originally appearing in the RECORD is to remain?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The context as it appears in the RECORD is to remain, because the Senator well knows that he objected to any change. I am only asking that the explanation I have now made be transposed in the permanent RECORD to follow my answer on that page. I do not see how the Senator could object to that.

Mr. BREWSTER. I should like to have inserted in connection therewith, also at the same point in the RECORD, this additional material, which it seems to me has a very pertinent bearing upon the question. With all deference to the intentions of the Senator from Arkansas, I think his record as a public speaker and as a debater, and his long training, are sufficiently familiar to my colleagues.

The question which I asked was—and it was in connection with a colloquy which was under way, and certainly in respect to which there was no possibility of misinterpretation:

Mr. BREWSTER. Would the Senator from Arkansas challenge the proposition that a very substantial majority of the membership on the other side of the aisle have privately and repeatedly expressed the opinion to their colleagues in this body that a change in the office of Secretary of State is now wise and desirable?

The answer appears in the RECORD, and, as I understand, the Senator from Arkansas does not challenge it:

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I think that is true.

This further colloquy followed then:

Mr. BREWSTER. That, it seems to me, tells the whole story.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I believe that many of the Senator's colleagues have gone far beyond that, and have indulged in exactly the sort of thing which I think both of us deplore; that is insinuation as to motives, and the insinuation that whatever failures there have been—and there is disagreement as to how effective our policy has been—resulted not purely from lack of wisdom, but from insincerity or from a lack of patriotism. That is what I am complaining about.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Now it seems to me that what the majority leader [Mr. LUCAS] had to say is very clear confirmation.

Mr. LUCAS. One point which the Senator has been making is with respect to the question of timing.

I am quoting from the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS].

It seems to me that is the most important point we are debating.

I may have been misinformed with respect to the Senator from Maine. If I have been correctly informed I wish to congratulate him. He can say yes or no, as to whether or not he did what has been reported to me. It is my understanding that in the conference of Republicans the Senator from Maine pleaded with his colleagues not to do what they have done, but seek an opportunity to sit down with Republicans and Democrats alike, together with the President of the United States, to see whether or not this project could not be moved along in the direction which the majority of Republicans desired. However, he was overruled. That is the story I heard. Whether it is true or false I do not know. But if it be true, I wish to commend the Senator if he took that position in the conference.

I skip three or four lines in which he challenged the action of the Republicans. I think I will not skip it. I will read it.

I feel that the Senator from Arkansas is entirely right. It seems to me unbelievable that my colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle should take this action on the eve of Mr. Acheson's departure for Brussels. If they had taken it 10 days ago, 2 weeks ago, or after his return, that would be something else. But in my humble opinion my Republican friends have practically destroyed his usefulness at that conference as a result of the action which they took.

Farther along, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] added:

It seems unbelievable that men in the United States Senate should take the action which was taken in tying the hands of the Secretary of State when he goes to a conference dealing with problems which may shake the foundations of the world within the next few days.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. FULBRIGHT] allowed me again to interrupt him, which I very much appreciated, and it will be found that I replied to the Senator from Illinois saying it was quite true that I had sought to accomplish the objective which many Members on both sides had in view, namely, a change.

Then I said:

About 2 weeks ago the Senator from Maine consulted what might be considered his opposite number on the other side with a view to such action. He found complete concurrence. The Senator from Arkansas has frankly admitted that there are many on the other side who feel that there should be a change.

Similarly, my views were presented to some of the executive departments and discussions were opened as to whether four or five Members on this side of the aisle and four or five Members on the other side might sit down with the President and explain to him why it seemed desirable for this result to be brought about.

No further reply has been received from the other side.

* * * * *

It was felt that the President himself, if he were properly advised by Members on the other side of the aisle, would immediately recognize the need for a change.

I omitted one sentence which follows something I read previously:

No further reply has been received from the other side. In spite of that, not only the Senator from Maine, but many other Senators on this side who have varying views, and some very intense views, sought to delay action when the Ives proposal was first made, with a view to some possible accommodation.

* * * * *

That is the reason why we drifted along until we were on the very eve of Mr. Acheson's departure. I was one of those most reluctant to act. However, I believe that the necessity for facing this issue was the result of the failure to recognize the implications of the election, and the very frank and candid admission by the Senator from Arkansas, which does credit to his honesty of purpose, that there were perhaps a majority on the other side who felt the wisdom of a change. If a change had been brought about at any time within the past month, this whole tragic situation could have been avoided. But it is not possible in view of the feeling in the country.

* * * * *

I have stated the reasons why those of us who have sought to defer this action found ourselves in a more and more untenable position. So it certainly does not seem to me that those on this side can be challenged for having finally felt that they must thus express their convictions that recent conditions demanded there be a change.

There it seems to me, if the Senator from Arkansas will permit, to be perfectly clear that throughout the whole colloquy it was entirely evident, and it proceeded upon the assumption, that a majority upon the other side of the aisle—and I think there is no question as to what "the other side of the aisle" means, as I was certainly speaking from this side of the aisle—felt privately that there should be a change.

I do not want to challenge the right or the propriety of the Senator from Arkansas expressing himself now as to what he may have meant, but I cannot conceive that in the entire colloquy of the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Arkansas there was any possibility for misunderstanding as to what we all had very definitely in mind.

I would simply ask that in whatever interpolation is made by the Senator from Arkansas, that my remarks similarly may be included following his in the interpolation in the permanent RECORD.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I should like to include in my unanimous-consent request whatever the Senator from Maine wishes to put in. The only point of my request is to clarify the RECORD. From my point of view, and, I think, as we all admit, the Senator from Maine is the cleverest man in the Senate in debate. He has the quickest mind, and so forth. I am simply stating, for whatever it may be worth to the Senate and the public, that his response does not represent my belief at that time or now, and that it was his words which were put into a form of a challenge by the Senator from Maine. He said, "the other side of the aisle." Now, to me in that kind of debate "the other side of the aisle" meant the Republican side. It was the side I had been discussing, I thought, for some several minutes. It was the action of the Republicans which I was deploring. And that is "the other side of the aisle." What I sought to do in correcting the RECORD last night was to say "that is true on the other side of the aisle, but not on this side." The Senator from Maine took exception to that correction. Therefore there has to be this explanation.

Now certainly, as to my unanimous-consent request, I am perfectly willing for the Senator from Maine to interpret it in any way he likes. I am only stating as a fact that I did not intend at that time, nor now, to say that the majority of the Members on this side, the Democratic side, wish to have the Secretary of State dismissed. To my knowledge only one person that I know of has publicly made such a statement on the Democratic side of the aisle. As to what the others have privately said, I am not here to speak for them now or any other time. That is all I want to do in the RECORD, and I am perfectly willing to include in my request that at this point in the RECORD, this explanation of mine, and whatever the Senator from Maine chooses to say, as he has, be put into the RECORD in order that whoever reads the RECORD will have the matter drawn to his attention.

If it is not transposed in the permanent RECORD, there will be nothing to indicate what my real opinion is. That is all I wish to have done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, let me inquire whether it will also appear that this was interpolated on the following day.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I think that is quite proper. I simply wish the facts to appear in the permanent RECORD as they are. As I understand, the Official Reporters often do that in the permanent RECORD, namely, transpose some colloquy which relates to a former occasion.

Mr. BREWSTER. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection whatever.

I wish to express my appreciation of the very generous compliment of the Senator from Arkansas. In view of the extensive training the Senator from Arkansas had in his Rhodes Scholar days and as president of a great university, I think he is quite capable of taking care of himself on the floor of the Senate, and I think that his earlier frank statement——

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I call for the regular order. The world is on fire. Continuation of the present out-of-order debate would simply tend to add fuel to the flames.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I had reserved the right to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When the regular order is called for, all previous reservations lapse.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator will not object to permitting me to conclude my statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia withdraw his demand for the regular order?

Mr. NEELY. No, Mr. President; I insist upon it.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. What is the unfinished business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is the conference report on the slot-machine bill.

Mr. WHERRY. I thank the Chair.

Mr. LUCAS subsequently said: Mr. President, I simply wish to take a minute or two of the time of the Senate to make it perfectly clear that in no way did the Senator from Illinois agree on yesterday, in the course of the debate and colloquy between the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Maine, that the majority, the Democrats on this side of the aisle, agreed that Secretary Acheson should resign or that the President should call for his resignation. The implication left by the statement made by the Senator from Maine is, I think, to that effect; and I wish to deny any such implication and deny that I made any such charge either directly or indirectly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Arkansas that the debate which has just taken place be transposed so as to appear in the permanent RECORD at the place indicated in yesterday's RECORD is agreed to.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I believe that many of the Senator's colleagues have gone far beyond that, and have indulged in exactly the sort of thing which I think both of us deplore: that is insinuation as to motives, and the insinuation that whatever failures there have been—and there is disagreement as to how effective our policy has been—resulted not purely from lack of wisdom, but from insincerity or from a lack of patriotism. That is what I am complaining about.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. One point which the Senator has been making is with respect to the question of timing. It seems to me that that is the most important point we are debating.

I may have been misinformed with respect to the Senator from Maine. If I have been correctly informed I wish to congratulate him. He can say yes or no, as to whether or not he did what has been reported to me. It is my understanding that in the conference of Republicans the Senator from Maine pleaded with his colleagues not to do what they have done, but seek an opportunity to sit down with Republicans and Democrats alike, together with the President of the United States, to see whether or not this project could not be moved along in the direction which the majority of Republicans desired. However, he was overruled. That is the story I heard. Whether it is true or false I do not know. But if it be true, I wish to commend the Senator if he took that position in the conference.

I feel that the Senator from Arkansas is entirely right. It seems to me unbelievable that my colleagues on the Republican side of the aisle should take this action on the eve of Mr. Acheson's departure for Brussels. If they had taken it 10 days ago, 2 weeks ago, or after his return, that would be something else. But in my humble opinion my Republican friends have practically destroyed his usefulness at that conference as a result of the action which they took. Because of the tension which exists throughout the world, it seems to me that that conference is probably the most important conference the Secretary of State has attended in connection with foreign affairs since he has held that office.

Almost every article we read is along the same line, whether we read Mr. James in the New York Times, Arthur Krock, the editorials in the Washington Star or Post, or the editorials from the Herald Tribune which have been placed in the RECORD by the Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN].

A cartoon from the front page of the Washington Star of yesterday shows Acheson boarding a plane with his hands tied behind his back with a rope. Mr. President, that tells it all. In my opinion those who operate the Washington Evening Star are absolutely on the square so far as their independence is concerned, and so far as the treatment of a problem is concerned. The cartoon and the editorial from the Star tell the story.

Mr. President, I am not making a plea for Acheson so much as I am making a plea for my country. As I stated on the floor of the Senate the other day, in my judgment this is the most critical period in the history of this Republic. It seems unbelievable that men in the United States Senate should take the action which was taken in tying the hands of the Secretary of State when he goes to a conference dealing with problems which may shake the foundations of the world within the next few days. I say definitely that in my opinion such action has weakened the position of our Secretary of State. There can be no question about it. My friends knew that he was leaving at this particular time. So I say that in my opinion the timing is very, very bad.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President——

Mr. MORSE rose.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I am ready to yield the floor. I wished to make one further observation. Does the Senator from Maine desire to have me yield to him? The Senator from Oregon has been on his feet. Does he wish me to yield to him, or does he desire the floor in his own right?

Mr. MORSE. I should like to have the Senator yield for a question, but I yield to my friend from Maine if he has a question.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, I desire to reply as soon as I may to what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] has said.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BREWSTER. It is quite true that the Senator from Maine has sought to accomplish the objective which many Members on both sides had in view, namely, a change. However, the Senator from Maine has found himself in a very unhappy position. This action has been held off for more than a month since the election. About 2 weeks ago the Senator from Maine consulted what might be considered his opposite number on the other side with a view to such action. He found complete concurrence. The Senator from Arkansas has frankly admitted that there are many on the other side who feel that there should be a change.

Similarly, my views were presented to some of the executive departments and discussions were opened as to whether four or five Members on this side of the aisle and four or five Members on the other side might sit down with the President and explain to him why it seemed desirable for this result to be brought about.

No further reply has been received from the other side. In spite of that, not only the Senator from Maine, but many other Senators on this side who have varying views, and some very intense views, sought to delay action when the Ives proposal was first made, with a view to some possible accommodation. It was felt that the President himself, if he were properly advised by Members on the other side of the aisle, would immediately recognize the need for a change. That is the reason why we drifted along until we were on the very eve of Mr. Acheson's departure. I was one of those most reluctant to act. However, I believe that the necessity for facing this issue was the result of the failure to recognize the implications of the election, and the very frank and candid admission by the Senator from Arkansas, which does credit to his honesty of purpose, that there were perhaps a majority on the other side who felt the wisdom of a change. If a change had been brought about at any time within the past month, this whole tragic situation could have been avoided. But it is not possible in view of the feeling in the country.

The appearance of the Secretary of State during his broadcast was tragic in the extreme. What is the explanation for it? It is beyond me. Everyone who saw it was shocked and horrified, not so much at the content of the broadcast, which did not commend itself, but at the appearance and delivery, which seemed to be that of a man who had completely lost his grasp, his courage, and his leadership. I have stated the reasons why those of us who have sought to defer this action found ourselves in a more and more untenable position. So it certainly does not seem to me that those on this side can be challenged for having finally felt that they must thus express their convictions that recent conditions demanded there be a change.

Mr. MORSE rose.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Does the Senator from Oregon wish me to yield?

Mr. MORSE. Yes.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. MORSE. I most respectfully wish to suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that I raise this question because I know he does not want any of his remarks to be subject to any misinterpretation in these rather moving times by having read into them an intention the Senator did not mean. Therefore it is as a matter of courtesy that I rise to be of assistance to the Senator from Arkansas in clarifying what I think there is need of clarification in the RECORD, with regard to his discussion of impeachment. I say this because surprisingly there are apparently forces on foot in this country that are bringing, at least to my own office, and I suppose to the offices of other Senators, telegraphic demands for the impeachment of the President of the United States. It disturbs me very much because I think it is merely a part of a dangerous emotional pattern sweeping the country.

The Senator from Arkansas in his intention to compare the British system of government with the American system of government, I am sure, sought to point out that the Secretary of State does not hold an analogous or compartive office to that of the Prime Minister of Great Britain.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. MORSE. Then the Senator made some remarks, which, I say, I am fearful may be misinterpreted by the press to the effect that if we wanted to accomplish what apparently critics of our foreign policy are seeking to accomplish, the proper course would be to impeach the President. I am fearful that that remark of the Senator from Arkansas—and I think that is a pretty fair statement of what he said—may cause some people to overlook the fact that he was merely speaking analogously in regard to the two Governments, that of the United States and that of Great Britain, and that if we did have the kind of system that exists in Great Britain, then as a congressional body comparable to Parliament, we would express a lack of confidence in the Government.

But I would like to have the Senator from Arkansas make clear, if I understand what I think is his meaning, that under our Constitution, to use a hypothetical case, the fact that we may be in disagreement with the President of the United States on foreign policy or any other policy does not support, under our Constitution, an impeachment proceedings. The Constitution is pretty clear as to the grounds for impeachment, and there are no grounds for impeachment under our Constitution simply because the Congress finds itself in disagreement with the President of the United States over a matter of policy, be it foreign policy or any other policy.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I appreciate very much the contribution of the Senator from Oregon. The Senator is quite right in his statement. I did not treat that subject in my prepared remarks at all. What I was trying to make clear was the difference between the situation in which Mr. Chamberlain found himself, which was referred to by the Senator from California [Mr. KNOWLAND], right after Dunkerque, and so on, when he was removed from office.

The Senator from Oregon is quite right. I am not suggesting, and I do not think there is any question on that point, that difference of opinion in matters of policy does not furnish a valid ground for impreachment. The only way to get rid of the Executive for reasons of policy is by defeating him in an election.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to read two portions of the Constitution of the United States, in order to make the matter clear in the RECORD?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. MORSE. Article I, section 3, of the Constitution provides that—

The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments.

Proceedings for that purpose—shall be on oath or affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: and no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

Then article II, section 4 thereof, reads:

The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdeameanors.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I thank the Senator from Oregon. Since the Senator brought up that point I wish to emphasize that I was certainly not suggesting that the President be impeached or that proceedings be instituted for that purpose. Of course, I would oppose such action I would go further and say that even on the merits, aside from the timing of this action by the members of the minority party, I do not think a continuation of the pressure to oust the Secretary of State, and in that way to try to solve the question at the moment, is a contribution to our way of government. Though I have had differences with the administration on matters of policy, I have never subscribed to the idea that the Secretary of State has any leaning toward the Communist line, or to Russia, or that he is an appeaser. I do not, by reason of the fact that I did not seek to question or to differ with some of the remarks of the Senator from California, wish to have it understood thereby that I acquiesce in them, or accept them as being valid. I did not intend to and do not intend to introduce that particular aspect of our foreign policy into the discussion.

I thank the Senator from Oregon for his contribution, and I desire to make it clear that I think it would be a great tragedy to seek to change our policy by any kind of impeachment proceedings.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I yield for a question.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. As one of those who were at the conference, and who, as the public knows, did not feel that the course my colleagues took was a wise one at this time——

Mr. FULBRIGHT. For which I commend the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. But that I rather favored the approach which would call upon the leadership of both parties to get together with the administration to see whether the changes which we all want to explore and have brought about could be brought about, I wish to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he feels that such a procedure might have been successful, and that those on the Democratic side as well as on the Republican side would have joined together in the matter if my colleagues had not seen fit to take the other position? I do not wish to criticize my colleagues.

I do not agree with the wisdom of the course they took. But many of us felt that any effort to get together to work this matter out would be perfectly fruitless because in the last analysis nothing could be done about it, and that there was a great desire in the country to have some action taken to express lack of confidence. But I think the action that was taken was unwise, as the Senator from Arkansas has pointed out. I wish to obtain an expression from the Democratic side as to whether they would have sat down with us and worked out a solution.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I am a very poor one to whom to address such a question. I am not in any sense among the leaders on this side, nor am I close to the administration. So I have no grounds for saying what could have been done in that direction. I can only add that some kind of cooperation, nonpartisan cooperation, with the best of will, is certainly called for under the circumstances. I think the leaders should get together on this matter as well as with respect to all other problems which are troubling us.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I think I can speak for all my colleagues here when I say that the action taken on this particular issue is no way showed a lack of support for the Secretary of State in his present mission. Of course, I did not vote for the resolution, but my colleagues added a paragraph indicating that we were entirely behind the administration in an effort to work out the problem.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. To me that is entirely contradictory, if I may say so.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I am speaking now of intent. I am confident there was no intent to hamstring or, as was previously suggested, to pull the rug out from under the Secretary of State just at this moment when he is on the way to Brussels.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I am trying to make it plain I do not question the intentions or motives of the Republicans at all. I am only questioning their wisdom in taking this action.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. It is difficult for me to differ with the Senator from Arkansas, because that is my position.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The situation is difficult enough as it is, and I hope we can keep our discussion on the basis of only the matter of the wisdom of the courses that are being proposed or pursued.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Snader, its assistant reading clerk, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the following bills and joint resolution of the Senate:

S. 3263. An act to amend Veterans' Preference Act of 1944 with respect to certain mothers of veterans;

S. 3654. An act to amend section 3 of the Postal Salary Act of July 6, 1945;

S. 3672. An act to amend section 3 (c) of the Civil Service Retirement Act so as to make the exclusion from such act of temporary employees of the Senate and House of Representatives inapplicable to such employees with one or more years of service;

S. 3910. An act relating to the assignment of surplus clerks in the Postal Transportation Service;

EMERGENCY POWERS OF THE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair) laid before the Senate a communication addressed to the Vice President, which was read by the legislative clerk and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 18, 1950.

Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
President, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: The defense effort we are now undertaking in order to meet the critical world situation will call for the use of a number of emergency powers. Many of these powers can be exercised under the authority of legislation now in effect. It is clear, however, that, as our mobilization program moves forward, there will be need for additional legislative authority. A number of proposals for new legislation are now being studied in the executive branch, and I expect to transmit recommendations to the Congress from time to time for emergency legislation as it becomes necessary.

Two of the measures which we know will be needed are of such importance for the tasks immediately ahead, that I wish to request action by the present Congress before adjournment.

The first of these is legislation along the general lines of title I of the First War Powers Act, 1941, which contained the emergency reorganization powers available to the President during World War II.

The current mobilization effort requires that the President be able to adjust from time to time, by rapid Executive action, the organization of the executive branch. Clear authority should be provided to establish such defense agencies as may be required, to coordinate, consolidate, transfer, and utilize existing agencies and officers, and to rearrange Government functions and personnel. Only in this way can the organization of the executive branch be kept continuously in line with the evolving requirements of defense mobilization.

In World War II the provisions of title I of the First War Powers Act, 1941, were used extensively in matters of vital importance to the war effort. For example, there were established under the authority of that title such major agencies as the War Production Board, the War Manpower Commission, and the War Shipping Administration.

It is clear that in a number of instances there may be need for similar kinds of action very quickly, as the present defense program moves forward. The Director of Defense Mobilization, Mr. Wilson, is already beginning to review the scope and character of our present programs and organizational arrangements in relation to the expanding job which lies ahead. As soon as changes are found to be necessary, the President should be enabled to place them in effect. Delay would only hamper the over-all effort. Therefore, it is of great importance that the necessary legislative authority be made available now, for the duration of the national emergency.

As was the case in World War II, these powers will not be used to make permanent changes in the organization of the Government. The changes that will be made under this authority will be temporary in nature, for the purpose of furthering the defense effort. When the emergency has ended, the agencies affected will revert to their present status unless further action is taken by the Congress.

The second of these measures on which I wish to request action by the Congress before adjournment of the present session is legislation along the lines of title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941, which contained the emergency contracting provisions in effect during World War II.

The authority to let contracts through negotiation can now be exercised as a result of the declaration of a national emergency. However, there is considerable doubt as to whether authority now exists for modifying contracts after they have been entered into.

It is already apparent that the agencies responsible for defense production will need authority to modify existing contracts in order to avoid undue delays in production and to keep suppliers in business on Government work.

For example, some Government suppliers now face possible bankruptcy because fixed prices in their Government contracts are entirely inadequate to meet rising costs. In certain cases, contract price adjustments are essential to keep these firms in production. Other Government contractors, engaged in especially hazardous work for the military services, may have to be indemnified promptly for damage to facilities and equipment in order that repairs or replacement may be undertaken without delay.

In these and many other instances, contract adjustments are needed to speed defense procurement. Therefore, I urge that title II powers again be made available. so long as the emergency lasts.

Representatives of the executive branch stand ready to furnish the appropriate committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives any information or assistance which may be desired in connection with these matters.

Sincerely yours,

HARRY S. TRUMAN.

PROHIBITION OF TRANSPORTATION OF GAMBLING DEVICES IN INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I call up the conference report on Senate bill 3357, to prohibit transportation of gambling devices in interstate and foreign commerce, and ask for its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3357) to prohibit transportation of gambling devices in interstate and foreign commerce, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, and agree to the same.

ED C. JOHNSON,
ERNEST MCFARLAND
E. C. J.,
JOHN J. WILLIAMS,
Managers of the Part of the Senate.

DWIGHT L. ROGERS,
LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
J. PERCY PRIEST,
JAMES I. DOLLIVER,
JOHN B. BENNETT,
Managers on the Part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the present consideration of the conference report.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not debatable.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on Senate bill 3357. [Putting the question.]

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado is recognized.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question, if he will yield to me.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. McMAHON. I understand that the conference report on the Yugoslav aid authorization bill will be ready a little later in the afternoon. I am informed that the conference report on Senate bill 3357 may take considerable time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I hope the Senator from Connecticut is mistaken, and that it will not take very long to dispose of the conference report on Senate bill 3357. For many months it has been ready for disposition by the Senate. It came to us in September, at which time it was debated at length. The further consideration of the conference report has been postponed because of important measures coming before the Senate, and in the interval the Senate has considered a great many measures of importance. I hope most of the debate on the conference report has been exhausted, and that we shall be able to proceed very quickly to vote on it, so that we shall not delay action on the matter about which the Senator from Connecticut is very properly so much concerned.

Mr. McMAHON. I join the Senator in the hope that this matter can be disposed of very quickly, and I certainly favor having the Senate dispose of it.

My question is this: If the conference report on the Yugoslav aid authorization bill is ready a little later in the afternoon, as I think it will be, inasmuch as I believe that it is now not controversial, or at least that it will not provoke any lengthy debate, would the Senator be disposed to agree to a unanimous-consent proposal to have the Senate take up the conference report on the Yugoslav aid authorization bill, and temporarily lay aside the conference report on Senate bill 3357?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Of course, Mr. President, I have been cooperating with Senators in regard to all matters coming up while the conference report on Senate bill 3357 has been ready for action by the Senate. I refer particularly to cooperation in regard to action by the Senate on all matters of vital importance to the United States and to our international affairs. So far as I am concerned, of course I would not wish to cause one moment's delay in connection with action by the Senate on the conference report the Senator from Connecticut has mentioned.

Mr. McMAHON. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, as I have said, this conference report has been before the Senate for a long time.

First, I wish to refer to the proposed legislation with reference to the transportation of slot machines. This measure grew out of a crime conference called by the Attorney General of the United States. The attorneys general of all the States, I believe, and representatives of the cities—either their mayors or persons appointed by them—held a crime conference, and made certain recommendations. As a result of those recommendations, the Attorney General of the United States sent to the Congress two pieces of proposed legislation. One of them is Senate bill 3357. This bill was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and was reported from that committee by a unanimous vote in favor of passage of the bill. The bill then was placed on the calendar. When the calendar was called, Senate bill 3357 was passed by the unanimous vote of the Senate, and went to the House of Representatives. In the House the bill was amended. Conferees were named by the Senate and by the House to resolve the differences between the two bodies in regard to the bill. After considerable discussion in the conference, the measure we have before us today was reported by unanimous vote of all the conferees on the part of both the House of Representatives and the Senate.

I have received from the Attorney General of the United States a letter, under date of November 29, addressed to me as chairman of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The letter reads as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., November 29, 1950.

Hon. EDWIN C. JOHNSON,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am most desirous that the Senate promptly and favorably consider the bill (S. 3357) to prohibit the interstate transportation of gambling devices. To that end I request your cooperation by calling up the conference report on the bill as soon as practicable.

The desirability of and need for this legislation are self-evident, and become more apparent with each passing day.

Sincerely,

J. HOWARD MCGRATH,
Attorney General.

Today I received by messenger another letter from the Attorney General. This letter was dated in his office on December 15, but I received it just today. The letter reads as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 15, 1950.

Hon. EDWIN C. JOHNSON,
Chairman, Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This week in Miami, Fla., the National Association of Attorneys General held a conference and among other things discussed at length the bill (S. 3357) dealing with the prohibition of the transportation of gambling devices in interstate commerce.

The members of this conference strongly urged that this legislation be passed by the Congress of the United States inasmuch as it was their considered opinion that such a bill would go far to aid them in combating crime in their respective States.

As you recall, I wrote to you some time ago—

That is the letter I just read—urging the passage of this bill on behalf of the members of the Attorney General's Conference on Organized Crime held here in Washington, D. C., on February 15, 1950. Again I strongly urge you on behalf of the National Association of Attorneys General, the members of the Attorney General's Conference on Organized Crime, and the Department of Justice to use every effort to bring about the passage of this bill before the closing session of this Congress.

Sincerely,

J. HOWARD MCGRATH,
Attorney General.

Mr. President, I am going to make every effort within my power and upon my responsibility to bring this matter to a vote on the part of the Senate, so that the conference report and the proposed legislation may be disposed of.

I wish to read into the RECORD a very brief article published in the Washington Post under date of December 7. I may say that I have in my files many editorials, published by newspapers in the United States, urging and demanding that the Senate and the House of Representatives complete action on this proposed legislation and enact it into law. Today I shall read only one brief newspaper article, as follows:

MCGRATH LETTER RENEWS DEMAND FOR BAN ON SLOTS

Attorney General McGrath yesterday renewed an urgent plea that Congress prohibit interstate shipment of slot machines.

He told Chairman EDWIN C. JOHNSON, Democrat, Colorado, of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, in a letter which McGrath made public today—

In fact, he made it public before I received it; I read it in the newspapers before I received it—that with each passing day the need for a law banning shipment of the machines becomes more apparent.

Both the House and Senate have passed such a bill, but in different forms. A compromise measure has been blocked by Senator MALONE, Democrat of Nevada—

So the article states. I know that the Senator from Nevada will object very much to that, but that is the way the press report reads—who talked against it for 11 hours just before Congress recessed last September.

The ban was originally proposed by the Attorney General's crime conference here last February.

As I have said, I have a great many editorials dealing with the subject, but I shall not burden the RECORD with them. Some of them take the Senator from Nevada to task, and I do not want to place anything of that kind in the RECORD, because I am presuming that the Senator from Nevada is acting from patriotic motives as he sees the situation.

Perhaps I should again read into the RECORD the differences between the House and Senate measures. They are stated in the RECORD of last September 19, but we shall all perhaps want to refresh our memories with respect to them.

The House struck out the definition of gambling devices contained in the original Justice Department bill, and substituted a much more specific and narrow definition, the effect of which is to limit the bill exclusively to slot machines and to exclude from the bill pin-ball machines. The conference agreed to this change. However, the definition in the conference report is still broad enough to include slot machines which do not pay off in cash and are paid off in merchandise. That is No. 1.

No. 2. The House bill defines "State" to include Alaska, Hawaii, Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, and Guam. This places these Territories in exactly the same position as the individual States. Hence, the legislative assemblies of all States and Territories would have the power to authorize the transportation of slot machines into such State or Territory.

Prior to this change in the bill these Territories were treated like poor relatives with respect to this matter. They were not given the dignity to which they were entitled, and the provision in the House bill extends to them rights which they should have with respect to gambling devices.

No. 3: It will be noted that the conference report version tightens the original Justice Department language by requiring the various States specifically to pass laws exempting such States from the provisions of the new law instead of merely allowing the governor to certify to the Attorney General that the State now has such a law. The effect, therefore, is to require each State legislature to enact legislation exempting that State or a particular subdivision of it from the effect of the Federal law. The Federal law does not go beyond the borders of any State. Any State can legalize slot machines and gambling devices. This bill has no effect whatever upon the laws of such a State. It does not go that far. All it concerns itself with is the transportation from one State into another. The House eliminated a provision which would have barred exportation of slot machines to foreign countries.

No. 4: The conference report requires every manufacturer and dealer in gambling devices to register annually with the Attorney General of the United States. The original Justice Department language would have required registration with the Collector of Internal Revenue in the collection district in which the business is carried on.

No. 5: The conference report modifies section 5 of the Senate bill by extending the prohibition to American flag ships on the high seas.

No. 6: The conference report also consolidates the penalty sections into a single penalty of $5,000 fine and 2 years' imprisonment for violations of all provisions of the bill. The Justice Department has provided two classes of penalties, a $5,000 fine and 2 years' imprisonment for violation of section 2, which prohibits the interstate transportation of gambling devices, and violation of section 5, which prohibits the manufacture, transport, possession, or use of gambling devices on Federal territory; and a $2,000 fine and 1 year imprisonment for violation of section 3, which deals with the registration of manufacturers of and dealers in gambling devices, and violation of section 4, which deals with the marking of packages containing gambling devices.

So, Mr. President, the sixth change in the House bill has to do with the consolidation of the penalty sections into a single penalty of a $5,000 fine and 2 years imprisonment, instead of the different categories which I have read.

Mr. President, as I have already said, this conference report was debated at great length in the Senate on September 19. I do not think it necessary to debate it again in such detail. If there are any questions as to the result of the changes proposed in the conference report, I shall be glad to try to answer them. The Senate conferees were informed that the language as finally adopted by the House was discussed with the Attorney General of the United States, who said he liked the language of the House bill much better than the language of the Senate bill. He approved the changes which were made in it.

Of course, we all know that the Attorney General of the United States has no authority to enact laws. He does not belong to the legislative department of this great Government. But this bill came from his office. It came from his office, not because of any particular thinking in the Justice Department, but because of a crime conference which was called, at which the mayors and attorneys general of the country assembled, and at which they made recommendations. Because of those recommendations by the law enforcement officers throughout the United States, the Attorney General wrote the department bill and sent it to the Congress. The Senate acted very promptly, as I have said. The House Committee held hearings lasting several days—and I commend them for it—at which time they gave everyone an opportunity to be heard either for or against the bill. They gave more attention to it, perhaps, than did the Senate. We passed it just as the Attorney General sent it to us, without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i." We enacted into law the bill which he recommended, because of the origin of this bill, coming out of the crime conference as it did. But in my humble opinion, and I have given considerable study to the subject, I think the House version makes it a much more acceptable, a more constructive measure, and I earnestly hope the Senate will very promptly enact into law the conference report on Senate bill 3357.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

GAMBLING DEVICES BILL—THE SENATE-HOUSE CONFERENCE REPORT ON SENATE BILL 3357 NULLIFYING STATE LAWS

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator from Colorado for his straightforward statement that the bill was written by the Attorney General of the United States and passed by the Senate exactly as he requested it.

NO OBJECTION TO SENATE BILL

I want to say, Mr. President, that the junior Senator from Nevada has no objection to this proposed legislation because the bill as passed by the Senate simply provided that wherever the use of such gambling devices was legal, as certified by the Governor of a State to the United States Attorney General, unbroken shipments from point of origin may go into that State.

DID NOT NULLIFY A STATE LAW

There was no objection because it did not nullify any law of any State, so far as the junior Senator from Nevada knew.

INCLUDES ALL GAMBLING DEVICES

I have to take issue with the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado that the House bill upon which the conferees agreed, only includes slot machines. It includes all gambling devices. This to me would mean the destruction of the thoroughbred horse industry since the parimutuel machines would be included along with roulette wheels and slot machines and other gambling devices. The Senate bill, which the Attorney General wrote, did not mention slot machines, but included all gambling devices. This, in my opinion, was proper because it did not nullify the 20-year-old gambling law of my State of Nevada. The governor merely certifies to the Attorney General of the United States that their use is legal.

HOUSE SUBSTITUTED ANOTHER BILL

Mr. President, the House of Representatives substituted another bill, almost in its entirety, and in that bill nullified a 20-year-old law of the State of Nevada through requiring an entirely new act to be passed by our legislature to exempt our State from the provisions of the act.

This would also be true of the shipment of parimutuel machines into States where horse racing is legal, thus nullifying the laws of those States making the use of such machines legal.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MALONE. I shall be happy to yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The conference report does not change or modify in the slightest degree any law of the State of Nevada. It simply exercises the constitutional right of the Congress to enact legislation affecting interstate commerce. Congress has acted in that capacity many times. The Senator will recall the Dyer Act relating to automobiles stolen in interstate commerce; the Mann Act with respect to white slavery; the Prison Goods Act which went to the Supreme Court. In the Whip and Collar case, as I recall, the Court established the right of the Federal Government and the Congress to enact this kind of legislation to protect the people. So that there is nothing new in this proposed legislation——

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I yielded for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Yes. I have no question to ask at this time.

NOT LEGAL TO STEAL AUTOMOBILES

Mr. MALONE. I would simply say, in order to clarify the matter, that the Dyer Act prohibited the movement of stolen automobiles across State lines. It, of course, did not nullify any State law, because no State had made it legal to steal automobiles. Nor were any other of the acts enumerated by the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado pertinent to this issue. They have no possible connection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MALONE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Does the Senator contend that the State of Nevada passed a law which opened the commerce of the country to the shipment of slot machines? Is that what he is saying? What law of the State of Nevada does this bill change?

THE HOUSE ACT NULLIFIES THE NEVADA 20-YEAR-OLD GAMBLING ACT

Mr. MALONE. The State of Nevada passed an act making gambling legal within the confines of that State. The passage of that act was within the framework of the Constitution, and this bill nullifies that law.

On the face of it, I do not see how the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado could assert otherwise. Under the provisions of the bill as presented now, it would be necessary for the State of Nevada to enact a new law to exempt itself from legislation passed by the Congress of the United States.

No one asserted the Attorney General sent a bill to the House.

The Attorney General sent a bill here to the Senate, and it was passed, as the distinguished Senator has said, without crossing a "t" or dotting an "i." That was all right, and no one objected, because, as the Attorney General wrote it, it did not nullify the 20-year-old gambling law of Nevada. It was only required that the Governor of Nevada certify that the use of such gambling devices was legal.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S VERSION SUBMITTED TO THE SENATE

The initiation of the law was approved at a meeting of attorneys general, then submitted to the Senate by the United States Attorney General, and I approve of it. This is the exact language of the report, written, I assume, either by the distinguished senior Senator from Illinois or his assistants, on Senate bill 3357, Report No. 1482, from which I read:

EXCERPT FROM SENATE REPORT NO. 1482

The bill herein recommended for enactment was transmitted to the Congress of the United States by Attorney General J. Howard McGrath on April 1, 1950. It grew out of the Attorney General's Crime Conference of representatives of local, State, and Federal law-enforcement officials which met in Washington on February 15, 1950, to discuss law-enforcement problems with reference to organized crime. The Crime Conference adopted a resolution specifically endorsing the proposed legislation and requesting the Attorney General to transmit it to the Congress with a request for enactment. Enactment of the bill was endorsed by FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover in testimony before the House Appropriations Committee earlier this year.

NO OBJECTIONS TO THE SENATE BILL

Mr. President, I have heard no objections to the Senate bill. Certainly if there had been objection, the bill would not have been passed on the consent calendar. But I say, Mr. President, that the bill passed by the House and agreed to by the Senate conferees is not the bill which the Attorney General sent to the Congress of the United States. He did not send this bill, and no one has asserted that he did. As to the proposed legislation which the Attorney General sent to the Senate, there is no record of his having sent it any other place. The bill, as written by the Attorney General, did not nullify the 20-year-old law legalizing gambling in the State of Nevada. There was no objection to it.

HOUSE CONFEREES DOMINATED THE CONFERENCE

I can understand how possibly the House conferees, being more assertive than is the senior Senator from Colorado, were allowed to rewrite the bill.

The junior Senator from Nevada asked to be invited before the conference, and he understands that that practice is customary, when there is an important piece of legislation in which a Senator is interested, whether he is a member of the conference or not. But he was not invited.

A SENATOR'S ATTENDANCE AT A CONFERENCE COMMITTEE

I am not informed whether the subject of my attendance was brought up and discussed. I do not know whether they discussed the question of allowing at such conference anyone who might have objection to the interference with a long-established State law passed within the framework of the Constitution of the United States.

NOT A MEMBER OF ANY STATE LEGISLATURE

Mr. President, I am not a member of the Nevada Legislature. I am not a member of the Kentucky Legislature, which voted for local option. I am not a member of the legislature of any of our 48 States.

Any State legislature could pass an act which may not conform to the junior Senator from Nevada's ideas of proper legislation.

LEGALIZED HORSE RACING

Legalized horse racing is permitted in California, Florida, Illinois, and in other States of the Union. The junior Senator from Nevada has nothing to say about such laws which are or may have been passed by such State legislatures. However, I would object on the floor of the Senate to the passage of any legislation which would seek to nullify any State law by the simple device of making it illegal to ship race horses across State lines. That is similar to what is sought to be done here.

THE CONTROVERSIAL SECTION 2 OF THE BILL

Mr. President, so that the RECORD may be complete, as the distinguished Senator from Colorado has said, the subject was debated at some length, and the debate with reference to it appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 20 and September 21.

I should like to read into the RECORD a part of section 2 of the Senate bill, and I ask that the remainder of the section be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION 2—SENATE BILL

SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful knowingly to transport or cause to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce any gambling device, or knowingly to take, receive, possess, or dispose of any gambling device transported in violation of this act: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to the course of unbroken interstate transportation of any gambling device into any State where the use of such device is legal, as certified by the governor of the State to the Attorney General of the United States and published by the Attorney General in the Federal Register. In the absence of such certification and publication, the use of gambling devices in any State shall, for the purposes of this act, be presumed to be illegal; and all persons and officials affected by the provisions of this act shall be entitled to act in reliance upon the presumption.

Nothing in this act shall be construed to interfere with or reduce the authority, or the existing interpretations of the authority, of the Federal Trade Commission under the Federal Trade Commission Act, as amended (15 U. S. C. 41-58).

Mr. MALONE. I read from section 2 of the Senate bill:

SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful knowingly to transport or cause to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce any gambling device—

The remainder of the bill is confined to definitions and penalties, and this section represents the heart of the bill. This is the bill which the Attorney General of the United States sent to the Senate—

or knowingly to take, receive, possess, or dispose of any gambling device transported in violation of this act: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to the course of unbroken interstate transportation of any gambling device into any State where the use of such device is legal, as certified by the governor of the State—

I ask the Senators to listen to this portion—as certified by the governor of the State to the Attorney General of the United States and published by the Attorney General in the Federal Register.

Mr. President, that is the provision in the bill which was sent to the Senate by the United States Attorney General. He never to my knowledge wrote any other bill or made any other suggestion in that respect. I read further:

In the absence of such certification and publication, the use of gambling devices in any State shall, for the purposes of this act, be presumed to be illegal; and all persons and officials affected by the provisions of this act shall be entitled to act in reliance upon the presumption.

Legislative action by the States represents the wishes of the people of that State. The members of a State legislature have more opportunity to know what the people of their State want than does the distinguished Senator from Colorado or the junior Senator from Nevada, neither of whom are members of State legislatures.

SECTION 2 OF THE HOUSE BILL

Mr. President, I now wish to read section 2 of the bill as passed by the House. I ask permission that any parts of the section which I do not read be made a part of the RECORD at this point.

Section 2 of the House bill provides:

SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful knowingly to transport any gambling device to any place in a State, the District of Columbia, or a Territory or possession of the United States from any place outside of such State, the District of Columbia, or a Territory or possession: Provided, That this section shall not apply to transportation of any gambling device to a place in any State which has enacted a law providing for the exemption of such State from the provisions of this section, or to a place in any subdivision of a State if the State in which such subdivision is located has enacted a law providing for the exemption of such subdivision from the provisions of this section.

TWENTY-YEAR-OLD LAW NULLIFIED BY CONFERENCE REPORT—HOUSE BILL

Mr. President, what would it do? What is the meaning of it? It means that a 20-year-old law in my State of Nevada would be nullified. Another law would have to be passed. Before it could be passed it would have to go before committees and be debated by the two houses of the legislature.

THE CONGRESS IN SMALL BUSINESS TO NULLIFY STATE LAW

Mr. President, I submit that the Congress of the United States is indeed in small business if it seeks to nullify a law passed by a State legislature, especially one which was enacted as long ago as 20 years, particularly when no principle is involved or served. It is simply an attempt to nullify an act of the Legislature of Nevada by the passage of a Federal act.

QUESTION OF LEGAL GAMBLING NOT BEFORE THE SENATE

Mr. President, I would say that the question of whether gambling should be legalized or not in the State of Nevada or in the United States of America is not before the Senate. Apparently no one has had the guts to submit such a bill for our consideration and face the issue clearly. If the Attorney General wants such a bill, to make all gambling illegal, let him introduce it. The Cabinet officers practically introduce bills—they control Congress, apparently. Everything they suggest is brought here without any proper consideration of its ultimate effect. Let the Attorney General introduce a bill prohibiting all gambling.

LET THE CONGRESS DEBATE GAMBLING ON ITS MERITS

Then let the Congress of the United States debate the bill on its merits. Let us not come in through the back door and try to nullify a 20-year-old law of a State simply because the proponents of such a measure do not have the intestinal fortitude to come out and say what they want to do.

Mr. President, I think I speak for every man, woman, and child in the State of Nevada when I say that the Nevada people want to do whatever is in their power to assist other States in enforcing its laws.

WOULD PROTECT ANY STATE'S RIGHT

The junior Senator from Nevada would stand on the floor of the Senate for another 12 hours, if it is necessary to do so, to protect the right of any other State to pass any legislation it wants to pass within the framework of the Constitution of the United States, without the Congress getting in its hair.

The moment we lose such a right we have gone another great step in the direction which I know the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado does not approve, and that is in the direction of a dictatorship in Washington. In other words, we would be bringing to Congress the power to pass upon all legislation by the States.

CITY OF WASHINGTON DANGEROUS TO THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

In the opinion of the junior Senator from Nevada, the city of Washington is the most dangerous city in the United States of America to the United States of America. Why do I say that? It is because every man, woman, and child in the city of Washington is either working for the Government, working for someone who is working for the Government, or selling something to someone who is working for the Government.

If one remained here for 3 months without going west of the city limits to again get the feel of the situation, to listen to the people making a living the hard way, he might conclude that everyone in the United States wanted to run the Government from here.

THE REPRESENTATIVES OF FOREIGN COUNTRIES

It is interesting to observe that there are 70, 80, or 90 consuls and ambassadors here. They are here at our expense, generally speaking, to get something out of the United States through the Congress. They want gift loans and free trade so that there will be no obstacle to bringing in all kinds of products manufactured by their cheap, low-living-standard labor.

FREE TRADE A WAR ECONOMY—CAUSE OF FINE PEACETIME ECONOMY

We are now in a war economy. The minute the war is over the cheap-labor products of the European and Asiatic countries will come into the United States by the boatload and trainload, and our boys will be out of work.

THE 1934 TRADE AGREEMENTS ACT

This process started in 1934, when we passed the 1934 Trade Agreements Act.

Here, Mr. President, is an example of the thoughtlessness of the Congress.

The pending measure is not quite as serious—it does not affect as many people as does the 1934 Trade Agreements Act.

CONGRESS ABROGATED ITS RESPONSIBILITY

The Congress of the United States abrogated its responsibility under that act. By that act it transferred to the executive department, meaning in this case the great State Department, its constitutional responsibility to regulate foreign trade through tariffs and import fees.

IT WOULD BE A SHAME TO OFFEND MR. ACHESON

This afternoon I listened to some very learned debate as to whether someone might have offended Mr. Acheson. Under cover, the free-trade sell-out of the workers and investors of this Nation is being completed at Torquay, England, today. It is said that the conferences will last until March. More than 100 so-called trade treaties are under discussion.

In the first place, there is no such thing as a trade treaty. Our tariffs are being lowered; and if another nation, by any chance does lower one of its tariffs, the possibility of anything being imported into that country is nil because of their quotas, embargoes, manipulation of currency values, and all known subterfuges. It is a one-way street.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN PEACETIME

We are now on a war economy. In June of this year, there were between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 unemployed in this country, because of the products of cheap labor shipped into our market. There were between 10,000,000 and 12,000,000 partially unemployed. Mr. Sawyer stated, after the war had been in progress for about 60 days, "We cured the unemployment situation."

ANOTHER EXAMPLE OF APPROPRIATING STATE'S RIGHTS

Mr. President, that is a tough way to cure unemployment. We have done it twice in the past 10 years—three major democratic wars in a generation—through the Democratic Party being captured by the Socialist Party and becoming a war party.

The pending measure is merely another example of the thoughtlessness of the Congress of the United States in transferring its responsible powers out of its jurisdiction and taking unto itself the rights of the States. I have been present on the floor of the Senate many times when the question of States' rights has been discussed. I have never seen the majority of the Senate vote for abrogating States' rights.

DO NOT GAMBLE—BUT WILL PROTECT STATE'S RIGHT TO LEGALIZE IT

Mr. President, personally I do not gamble. I take no particular credit for that fact. I simply do not gamble. But if the people of Mississippi or the people of Nevada or the people of Montana want to enact a law legalizing gambling devices, and the State law is within the framework of the Constitution of the United States, I will do all in my power to protect the action of that legislature. That is what I am doing today. That is what I did during the 12-hour debate in September.

GOVERNORS BOARD OF DIRECTORS OF PRESIDENT

If we continue the steady encroachment upon States' rights, taking them in one by one, it will be only a very short time before the governors of the 48 States will be only a board of directors for the President of the United States. It is a pattern, Mr. President. The trend has been going on for 18 years. It is my honest belief that the senior Senator from Colorado also objects to it in his heart.

HOUSE HAS NOT APPROVED CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. President, it is customary, and has been for many years, when a Senate bill passes and it goes to conference and the conferees agree on a report, that the House consider adopting the report first. It is customary, if a House bill passes and is passed by the Senate and sent to conference, and the conferees agree, for the Senate to consider the report first. For some unknown reason we are presented with the conference report without the House having first approved it as has become the custom.

WHAT ARE THE CONCEALED OBJECTIVES OF THE BILL?

Mr. President, there is a brief sentence in the report, No. 3111, which states that a couple of amendments were adjusted in the conference. I read from the report:

> The second amendment would have permitted a State which has enacted a law providing for the exemption of such State from the provisions of section 2 of the bill to ship gambling devices from such State for repairs into another State.

The language which turned down that amendment is something out of this world. "The House conferees felt that these two amendments"—but referring particularly to the second amendment—"are incompatible with the objectives of this legislation."

Mr. President, what are the objectives of this legislation? Are they to help the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado enforce the law in Colorado, or are they to make it impossible for any State to operate a gambling device, regardless of the State law? According to this language, if a machine is shipped to another State for repair, when there are no repair facilities in the State where the gambling device is legally used, it would seem that it is not the objectives of the bill to enforce the law in other States.

The objectives seems to be to prevent a State which has a law making the use of such gambling devices legal from actually utilizing such devices by preventing them from being returned for repairs.

THE SUBJECT OF WHETHER SUCH DEVICES SHOULD BE LEGAL—NOT UNDER DISCUSSION

The junior Senator from Nevada is not discussing whether the use of these gambling devices should be legal in Nevada or in any State within the United States. He is not discussing the question as to whether they should be legal in the State of Nevada or the State of Mississippi, or the State of Florida, for the simple reason that that question is not before the Senate.

The question before the Senate is, Shall it become the practice of the Congress of the United States to go through the back door and nullify and defeat the objective of the laws of a State even though they have been passed within the framework of the Constitution of the United States?

DEFENDING THE RIGHTS OF STATE LEGISLATURES

There are, no doubt, persons in my State, and persons in Mississippi, the State of the Presiding Officer, and persons in every other State who do not feel the use of gambling devices should be made legal.

As the junior Senator from Nevada has said, he is not a member of the Nevada Legislature. He is not a member of any other State legislature. He is a Member of the Senate of the United States, and, as such, regards as his responsibility and his duty to defend the right of any State to pass any law it wants to, within, of course, the framework of the Constitution, without the Congress getting into its hair.

BILL TO PROHIBIT ALL GAMBLING

If Congress should want to pass legislation prohibiting gambling of every nature, we would discuss roulette, slot machines, pari-mutuels for horse racing; we would discuss the use of all gambling devices, including the use of playing cards. Many persons are adverse to the use of playing cards. Many are against horse racing.

This bill would merely snipe at horse racing by prohibiting the shipment of such devices in interstate commerce.

Mr. President, what we are now considering may be merely the first step.

Perhaps the next step will be to make it illegal to send a race horse or a pack of playing cards across a State line. This bill prohibits the shipment of parimutuel machines in interstate commerce—which I am advised, would severely curtail the race-horse and the quarter-horse industry. It may then be provided that there must be a breeding farm in every State, that there must be a card factory in every State, and a parimutuel machine factory in every State.

Mr. President, at the conclusion of my remarks I shall move to refer the legislation back to the conference committee with instructions to the Senate conferees that they stay with the Senate legislation, as they should have done in the first place, or at least to the extent that they will oppose the nullifying of any State law which has been passed within the framework of the Constitution.

ASK CONFEREES NOT TO NULLIFY STATE LAWS

All the junior Senator from Nevada asks is that the Senate conferees not agree to the nullification of a State law and make additional legislation necessary.

LEGAL GAMBLING NOT BEFORE SENATE

Mr. President, I wish to reiterate at this point that the question of whether or not gambling should be legal in any State of the Union is not before the Senate.

The only question before the Senate today is that raised by the conference report. The question the junior Senator from Nevada raises is the advisability of the Senate conferees accepting proposed legislation contained in a conference report, when the legislation proposed by the Senate itself did not contain such proposals.

I question the advisability of the proposed legislation as passed by the House and accepted by the conferees which would nullify a 20-year-old law of a sovereign State of the Nation—a law passed within the framework of the Constitution of the United States, and expressing the will of the people of that State.

Mr. President, I can sympathize with the people of Colorado if they cannot enforce their laws against gambling devices in Colorado. I cannot, however, agree that they should nullify another State's law in order to enforce their own.

ANY CHIEF OF POLICE CAN ENFORCE LAW

The chief of police in any city of America, backed by his mayor and city council, in a city where gambling is illegal, could close up gambling in that city within 24 hours. Is it because men cannot be obtained in certain States who will enforce the State laws against gambling that it is proposed here that Congress pass legislation which would nullify the law of another State which handles the proposition in an entirely different manner.

DO NOT MAINTAIN IT IS PERFECT ANSWER

I do not say the method used by Nevada in the matter of gambling or anything else is a complete answer to any of the problems involved. The junior Senator from Nevada has never said that. But the Nevada Legislature—the Assembly and the State Senate—elected by the voters in all the precincts in the State, has spoken for Nevada in the matter.

Mr. President, I have never said that the solution of the gambling problem has been arrived at by my State, Nevada. I have said that the legislature of my State, expressing the will of the people of the State, has passed a measure making the use of gambling devices legal.

MANY PROBLEMS STILL TO BE SOLVED

Over the years there has been considerable question in regard to gambling, liquor, and various other problems in the States and cities.

An examination of the statutes of the States will reveal, I believe, that they have endeavored in different ways to solve these questions. However, so far as I know, this is the first time an attempt has been made by the Congress of the United States to nullify a State statute. I say this with all due respect to the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado, who referred to the Dyer Act, the Mann Act, and other acts which have nothing whatever to do with this proposed act, because none of the other statutes he has named nullified the law of any State.

So far as I know it never was legal in any State for a person to steal an automobile. Therefore, the Federal law making it illegal for a stolen automobile to be transported across State lines was merely a help to the States in enforcing their own laws.

ATTORNEY GENERAL WORDING OF PROPOSED STATUTE APPROVED

If the Senator from Colorado would agree to have this measure worded as was proposed by the Attorney General of the United States, so that it would not be necessary for the Legislature of Nevada to pass another act similar to the one which was passed by the State legislature 20 years ago, the situation would be different and no objection would be entered.

COOPERATE TO WORK OUT A SUITABLE BILL

If this conference report is returned to the conferees, the junior Senator from Nevada would be willing to confer with the conferees and work out something which will be entirely satisfactory to the Attorney General of the United States and still not nullify a legal act of the legislature of any State. Furthermore, Mr. President, if during this short time it is impossible for us to arrive at a measure which will be satisfactory to all concerned, the junior Senator from Nevada has expressed a willingness, immediately upon the convening of the next Congress, to confer with the senior Senator from Colorado or his committee or any other committee, and with the Attorney General, if he wishes and work out a suitable measure.

ACT RECOMMENDED BY ATTORNEY GENERAL NOT OPPOSED

Mr. President, the measure recommended by the Attorney General of the United States was not opposed. That measure provided that it would be necessary for the Governor of any of the States, including my own State, to certify to the Attorney General of the United States that the use of such gambling devices was legal in his State. No one objects to a measure of that kind.

However, the junior Senator from Nevada does object when such measure is perverted to nullify a 20-year-old statute in his own State.

May I remind my colleagues that the Attorney General is committed to the bill as it was passed by the Senate.

Now to attempt to nullify an established statute of any State I think is highly improper. I think it is time for the Senate to take cognizance of all such proposed legislation.

PROBABLY NOT LAST STATE AFFECTED

When the law was passed in Nevada, within the framework of the Constitution of Nevada and within the framework of the Constitution of the United States, the State legislature was acting in carrying out the will of the people of Nevada.

Mr. President, I wish to remind the Senate that although Nevada may be the first State so affected, it probably will not be the last one, if the step now proposed is taken.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT TO SENATE-HOUSE CONFEREES

Mr. President, at this time I move that the conference report on Senate bill 3357 be recommitted to the Senate-House conferees, with instructions to the Senate conferees to disagree with the House amendments, and to insist upon the bill as previously passed by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHAPMAN in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President——

Mr. MALONE. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I wish to be recognized in my own right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does that mean that the junior Senator from Nevada now loses the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Did the Chair correctly understand the Senator from Nevada to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. MALONE. I withdraw the suggestion.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I have propounded a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does this mean that the junior Senator from Nevada now loses the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Has the Senator yielded the floor?

Mr. MALONE. I intended to yield to the Senator from North Dakota, without losing the floor, but I now relinquish the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I do not think it is good policy for Senators to continually farm out the time on the floor to other Senators, and I would object to that. The Senator from Nevada made a motion; and, when a Senator makes a motion, he loses the floor, of course. If the Senator from North Dakota has the floor, I do not see any point in having the Senator from Nevada yield to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has been recognized.

UNITED STATES FOREIGN POLICY—ATTITUDE OF GERMANS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, at the time the Senate debated the question of approving the Charter of the United Nations, I opposed it. I believe I am today the only Senator upon the floor who was against approval of the Charter at that time. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a part of my speech upon that occasion. I said I was opposed to adoption of the United Nations Charter, and as shown by page 8188 of the RECORD of July 28, 1945, I said:

> I would be willing to vote for the appropriation of the last dollar in the United States Treasury, and the last dollar we could borrow if, by spending that money, we could eliminate war, which we all abhor and hate. I would unhesitatingly vote for the Charter if I felt that it offered even the tiniest hope of a permanent peace. But, in spite of that, Mr. President, I feel from the bottom of my heart that the adoption of the Charter—and make sure we are going to implement it—will mean perpetuating war.

I repeat the words "would mean perpetuating war." I continued:

> I feel it will mean the enslavement of millions of people from Poland to India, from Korea to Java, as well as people in many other places on this earth.

Quoting further:

> Mr. President, I feel that the adoption of the Charter will be one step more toward compulsory military conscription, and all that which goes with war.

Mr. President, I submit that what I prophesied on that occasion has come true. What I am particularly concerned with is not Asia, because, bad as is the situation in Asia today, the situation is much worse in Europe.

Today the situation in Germany, for instance, needs immediate and constructive attention. When the victorious American and allied armies entered southern Germany they were hailed as long-awaited liberators, who would free the German people, not only from invasion by communism, but also from oppression by nazism. The German people were disappointed when they learned that unconditional surrender by them meant not only surrender of the Hitler government but of all the German people.

Mr. President, when the Americans approached Germany the German and Austrian people climbed to the roofs of their houses to wave their white shirts and white rags in celebration of the fact that, at last, their friends, the Americans, even though they had been fighting them for many months, were now coming in to take charge of the enemy in Berlin. I think every Senator knows what happened—that the Government of the United States permitted Russia and Joe Stalin to place an iron ring, not only around Berlin but also around the earth. Today Members of this body may wonder whether the German people are going to take up arms against Russia, whether Western Germany is to be included, in truth and in fact, as well as in the matter of arms, in the Atlantic Pact.

Today, across the water, Mr. Acheson, representing our Government, meeting there with other representatives of the Atlantic Pact, face as their chief problem the question of whether Germans are to be integrated as a part of the force to fight the Communists. In the newspaper this morning it was stated that if the United States remained in Asia, and if the forces in Japan and the Chinese Nationalists were allowed to help, it would mean a 30-years' war.

So when I said that if we adopted the United Nations Charter it would mean perpetual war, I uttered a prophecy which has come true.

What we are all concerned about today is the situation in Europe. When we speak of Europe, I think of the words of Gen. Omar Bradley, who said that the people of Germany were the crux of the entire European situation.

Mr. President, after the war the principle of collective guilt was used in dealing with the German people. They accepted it, especially after learning of the crimes against humanity which had been committed by the Nazi government against the Jews, the Catholics, and the Lutherans. In their present status, however, the German people feel that they have suffered their humiliation, that they have paid a sufficient price for the sins of the Nazi leaders in this world of confusion, when so many wrongs were committed by people who sat in judgment on the rest of mankind. The Germans feel that they, too, have a right to live again as a free and self-supporting people.

I go into this in some detail because so many Senators have asked me to speak upon the floor and to give the results of my journey in Europe, where I went at my own expense, entirely apart from the military, entirely apart from the Department of State, and merely as one United States Senator who wanted to find out what the real situation was. I was peculiarly fitted for that task, Mr. President, because, as Senators I know, I speak the German language. I could wander about in a most unobtrusive manner talking with people, trying to arrive at their true inward feeling. I say that the proof that the majority of the Germans never approved of the Nazi policy is the well-known fact that Hitler could rule only by police-enforced dictatorship.

Mr. President, as I proceed I think I shall make it abundantly clear that ever since we got into World War II, all through that war, and in all the years after that war, all the 5 years after it, our Government has made every mistake it could possibly make. I do not know of a single one it missed. I invite attention to the fact that it is not only the Democrats who are responsible. Oh, no, Mr. President. Republicans rise today and shout to high Heaven against the administration. They can call Mr. Acheson all the names they want to call him, and they can, as was done last week, with only five of us in the Republican caucus voting against them, stick a knife into the back of Mr. Acheson. We send him across the water discredited in every way in which the Republican Party could discredit him. But the truth of the matter is that during that entire time we had a bipartisan foreign policy. During the Eightieth Congress the record shows every single vote of the 13 members of that committee was unanimous. That is a fact, Mr. President.

I know that I was the only sinner upon the floor who voted against the confirmation of Mr. Stettinius. The 3-hour talk I delivered upon that occasion was entirely in vain; but it was under his architecture and that of Alger Hiss that at San Francisco the United Nations Charter, with a veto power included at the request of the American and English representatives, was adopted and submitted to this body.

Who, Mr. President, gave the most eloquent speeches in favor of its adoption with the veto power included? It was Senators on the Republican side of the aisle. Some of my Democratic colleagues rose and said, "Under the United Nations Charter it is impossible to get into a war because the United States has not surrendered a single shred of its sovereignty." But we are in a war, Mr. President; we are in a war up to our necks. Only an hour and a half or two hours ago upon this floor we heard the distinguished senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] say that never in all the history of the United States, certainly during the 40 years he has been a Member of the Congress, has our Government faced a more critical situation. In part that critical situation arises from our treatment of Germany and Austria. Something which was entirely and unanimously ignored by the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, and ignored by our Department of State was that the majority of the Germans never approved of the Nazi policy, and it is a well-known fact that Hitler could rule only by police-enforced dictatorship. However, representatives of the State Department, our national administration, and the members of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate stood idly by and did nothing. Now when we are face to face with a crisis, they try to blame Secretary Acheson.

I invite the attention of my fellow Senators, Mr. President, to the fact that I was one of six Senators who voted against the confirmation of Mr. Acheson. But I do not propose to sit idly by and see any group of Senators, whether they are on the Democratic or Republican side, make a goat of Mr. Acheson when he is not to blame. Mr. Acheson, in my opinion, is no more guilty than are some of the very Republicans who stuck a knife into his back last week.

In Germany, Mr. President, children are growing up, and their parents feel that at least they should not be condemned or punished for the political mistakes of the past. I found that the Germans are a proud people, too proud to parade their poverty publicly or to be beggars at their neighbors' doors. They are also a conservative and industrious people. I submit that the 33,000,000 Americans who are of Teutonic origin, set an example for industry, for thrift, for being law-abiding citizens, and for being good, patriotic Americans. Millions of persons in Germany are relatives of the millions in this country, and they are very much alike.

As I judge the picture, the Germans over there realize the present political situations in the world. They know there can be no compromise between the dictatorship of communism and the rights and freedoms of democracy. The great majority of the German people want three things: Political independence, religious freedom, and the right to earn a decent living. Complete political independence for Germany at this time is dangerous. They feel it might aggravate Russia into a war in Europe, and it would surely lead to disagreements among our allies.

Religious freedom has been granted to the Germans in the western zone. It might be said, however, that our interpretation of the complete separation of church and state in connection with the administration of the McCloy funds is causing much misunderstanding, because in Germany the social and charitable work which is carried on is so much a part of organizations that are definitely either Catholic or Lutheran. There is no quarrel between these two groups, but they often find themselves excluded in favor of some new nonreligious organization that calls itself liberal. The Germans feel that, although unintentionally, we are nevertheless, at least indirectly, interfering in the religious life in Germany. I think it is very important that the persons in charge of administering the McCloy funds should be given much broader power in favor of religious groups who are doing social work, the rule being that all moneys allotted must be used for social and charitable work and not for purely religious purposes.

Within the realm of immediate possibility, then, there is a third desire of the Germans, namely, to earn a decent living. At the present time, and under the present set-up, it is entirely impossible for too large a proportion of Germans in the western zone to earn a decent living. What are the reasons why Germans cannot earn a decent living? First, a large percentage of the factories have been destroyed in the war or were dismantled after the war, with the result that entire towns, in some cases, were left without any work possibilities. Second, 40 percent of the houses were completely destroyed, many more damaged by war. The victims who survived had to seek refuge in the country, where there was no work for them.

Third, into such a disturbed economy of Western Germany more than 12,000,000 German expellees were driven, robbed of their homes, their possesions, coming often with only the clothes on their bodies, with no kitchen utensils, no bedding, no provisions of any kind; thousands of them sick. Hundreds of thousands of the men who belonged to these refugee families had been kept back in slavery to work the farms and factories they had owned or to be sent as slaves into the mines and into Siberia. Even if Western Germany had not lost 40 percent of its housing it would have required 1,200,000 new dwelling units to take care of the expellees.

The International Refugee Organization refused to lend any assistance, not only to the Germans driven out of former German territory, but also to the millions of Germans who were ethnic Germans, driven from their homes in Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Yugoslavia, and other Balkan countries and from the Baltic states. These ethnic Germans had never been citizens of the German state, but still they were dispossessed and persecuted, and the International Refugee Organization refused to take any responsibility for them. The shattered economy of present Western Germany had to accept more than 10,000,000 of these unfortunate people.

Thank God, the charity of American people, in response to the appeals of Jewish, Catholics, and Protestant organizations, did much to relieve the sufferings imposed by the political policies of the victors in the war. May I say here that only this charity, consisting of hundreds of millions of dollars, saved the 70,000,000 Germans from spiritual despair and physical starvation.

Every Senator should realize the desperate plight of the German people at that particular time.

Marshall plan aid, given for diplomatic reasons, would have been much too late had it not been for this charity, inspired by religious motives. The German people are deeply appreciative of this charity. But the time has come when they ask for an economic arrangement that will permit them to live by the work of their hands and talents. They refuse communism, they wish to be accepted again into the family of democratic nations. If we refuse this request we shall strive in vain to save Europe from disaster, in spite of the billions we have given to England, France, Italy, and other European countries. It is only in Germany and Austria that communism can be stopped from conquering all of Europe. In saying it, I emphatically endorse what was said by Gen. Omar Bradley only a few weeks ago.

The free and democratic powers need the assistance of the German and Austrian peoples. The effective assistance of these people can be had for the investment of a sum of money that is insignificant compared to the billions we are voting for the equipment of American and other armies that are to fight the aggression of communism. Yet, the investment we make in the Western German and Austrian economy today are as much a part of our defense program as the billions of dollars spent for guns and airplanes. The German and Austrian people will be our strongest allies in the fight we are waging, but we must give them economic assistance to permit them to live decently. We must give to the present Governments of Germany and Austria, limited as they are, a political prestige with their own people so that these Governments show to their people that cooperation with the democracies is really their only hope to reestablish themselves in the family of democratic nations. We must give to the present German and Austrian Governments the economic assistance necessary to give homes and jobs to the millions of expellees we helped to force upon them, because in the Potsdam Agreement we did give sanction to a migration of people that, under Russian-inspired brutality, turned out to be the largest and most inhuman forced migration in the history of mankind.

In all the history of the world, Mr. President, there has never been anything like it heretofore. The signing of the Potsdam agreement sent 15,000,000 people into slavery. Abraham Lincoln, whose picture hangs on the wall of this Chamber, would turn over in his grave if he knew that a President of the United States had signed an agreement which sent 15,000,000 people into the most inhuman forced migration and slavery in the history of mankind.

We need not be too worried about the votes against rearmament that we so recently witnessed in southern Germany. The German and Austrian people live in daily fear of a Russian invasion. They cannot and will not vote to take up arms unless and until there is a real hope that the Russian armies will be stopped at the German and Austrian borders. At present, even a token membership of Germans in a European army would give the long looked-for excuse that Russia wants for invading Western Germany. The recent voting in southern Germany was against a rearmament they consider inefficient and dangerous. This was the first opportunity the expellees had to register their demand for a place to live and work in this changed Europe. We know from their history that these expellees are a conservative people. They are people of Yugoslavia and of Rumania who were living there for hundreds of years. Tito comes along. He is the man to whom we voted millions of dollars a few days ago. Tito and his Government wanted those farms. So they walked in and took them. If the man in charge of a farm did not want to give it up he was killed. They took the wives and children of those farmers and drove them out of the country and into Germany. Now they have nationalized the farms.

When the peasants did not raise enough food, what happened? The propagandists said there was a drought, and that good old Uncle Sam should send millions of dollars to feed the people. So we find the United States Government lining up with those scoundrels, those crooks, those Communists. Hard working heads of families have been deprived of their farms; and when the patriotic peasants and farmers would not raise a crop, the people of the United States were taxed to send them food, and to back up everything that Tito had done. That is why the senior Senator from North Dakota did not vote for aid to Yugoslavia. In my opinion it is a good, sound, unanswerable reason.

Those families were driven from their homes, away from their churches, away from their schools. Where are they today? We have heard a great deal of the displaced persons; but the situation of these millions of people is just as bad as the worst we have ever heard about displaced persons. I saw them. They live in single rooms, three or four families in a room. They live in camps and shacks. Children are without proper food, and are getting no education. How can they when the heads of families are without work and fathers and mothers see no hope of reestablishing a home? When that is the situation, ballots will be cast in protest, even by a conservative people. Let us never forget, Mr. President, that every expellee who comes into Germany is automatically a citizen, with the right to vote. That is why 3 weeks ago yesterday in Hesse, and in Württemberg, Baden, and 2 weeks ago yesterday in Bavaria, we found Social Democrats for the first time in history gaining an overwhelming victory at the polls. In Bavaria for the first time we found an almost solid phalanx of Social Democrats, getting more votes than any other party.

All our millions of dollars spent to advocate democracy will do little good if we fail to offer hope of jobs and homes. If we now build up Western Germany and Austria economically it will be the source of internal physical strength and political unity that we shall need far more than any presently contemplated small German army in the event that Russia attacks democratic Europe. If the Russian attack comes, in spite of all our efforts to keep the peace, every German and Austrian possible will march with us in the battle which will decide the future of the world.

Let me repeat the warning that if Western Germany should fall a victim to Russia, the hundreds of millions of dollars which we have spent in France, Italy, and England will have been spent in vain, for those nations, too, will fall before Communist aggression.

The Voice of America speaks in vain to the Germans in the Russian zone and to the oppressed people in Russian satellite countries unless it can not only tell of freedom in distant democratic countries, but point to liberties, food, and homes gained by the people of Western Germany and Austria who have been associated with the Western democracies. American fathers and mothers would much rather give money than sacrifice the lives of their sons and daughters in this battle for freedom and human rights. I wish to say publicly, not only to Members of the Senate, but to the American people, that helping Western Germany and Austria to take care of millions of homeless expellees will save American lives, and it should be a part of our present defense program.

Mr. President, let me sound a final warning. If we refuse the necessary assistance to the present conservative governments in Western Germany which support democratic institutions, we shall play into the hands of the smaller radical groups who are now attempting to unite their forces. They call it the German neutrality movement. Should this group attain power they will negotiate a modus vivendi with Russia. Then again we shall see in all Germany a dictatorship of the minority, as we already see it in Eastern Germany, supported by Russia. That will end all hope of a free and prosperous Europe.

Have we not learned a lesson from the mistakes of England and France when they refused the help which Chancelor Bruening asked for a few years ago? Have we not learned a lesson from our own recent mistakes in China? What we need today is not revolution, destroying the good with the bad, not restoration, which returns the evil with the good, but a renovation—building a new world order on social justice, economic security, and religious freedom. This renovation in the world order must include Western Germany and Austria.

Specifically, I should like to go into detail as to some of the things which have taken place in Germany during the past 5 years. Why is it that our American Government has been helping the Communists over there rather than the German people?

There has been much discussion, both pro and con, with respect to the war-crimes trials which we held in Nuremberg. I am not now speaking of the first Nuremberg trials, in which the Russians openly participated, to try Goering and the other Nazi leaders. I am speaking of the subsequent war-crimes trials, which were conducted by American judges, under American law written especially for the purpose. The prosecutors were Americans. Let me repeat, Mr. President, that I am speaking not about the first Nuremberg trials, where Goering and his associates were tried. I am speaking of the subsequent war-crimes trials, which were conducted by American judges, under American laws written especially for the purpose. The cases were prosecuted by American prosecutors and defended only by German lawyers. One of our fundamental principles of justice is that the accused has the right to select his own lawyer, and that if he is denied the right to select his own counsel he cannot be said to have had a fair trial, as we in this country understand fair trials.

Mr. President, the very German men the Senate want to fight alongside our boys against Russia and at whom the Senate wonders because they do not wish to do so, as it wonders why in the last three elections the vote has been against America—those very German men are now talking and complaining about the war-crimes trials.

At those war-crimes trials, when some of the defendants asked for American lawyers to defend them in American courts, since they were tried by American prosecutors, before American judges, their requests were refused. What do Senators think of that? What did the Foreign Relations Committee do, Republicans and Democrats alike, when that was going on? The matter was brought to the attention of the members of that committee. But what did the great Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate do?

The refusals were generally by the prosecution. This is not to say that the German lawyers, counsel in these cases, were not able. Generally, the people over there believe that the German lawyers were men of high intellectual and legal ability. But they were Germans and treated as such by the Americans, who were very conscious of the fact that America was victorious in the war.

Moreover, the rules under which the defendants were tried were not the rules and laws prevailing in Germany, but were the rules written specifically for the purpose of the trials. Though the laws were drafted by Americans they did not follow American standards of procedure at all. Again I repeat, I am not talking about the first trials. I am talking about the trials of the great masses of German citizens who were arrested. Certain as it is that the sun rises in the east and sets in the west, so some day in the future American boys and American girls are going to pay the penalty for what has been done.

Mr. President, in this country, we do not permit ex post facto laws, but in Nuremberg such laws were permitted to be made use of. Here we demand that the accused shall have the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him. The most humble man or woman in this country arrested for stealing a bicycle, has, under our Constitution, the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him or her. In this country we allow no hearsay evidence in a criminal case. At Nuremberg the American prosecutors were allowed to and did use affidavits, some containing hearsay evidence, or being based on hearsay evidence. Then we wonder why the Germans do not want to fight alongside us.

Living accommodations in Nuremberg were luxurious for the prosecutors and inadequate for the German defense lawyers. That is what the Germans over there tell us, Mr. President. Though in a case before the court all the lawyers were supposed to be treated equally, at Nuremberg in many respects the German counsel were not treated with the same consideration accorded American counsel. At Nuremberg the American Chief of Counsel was also the Federal administrative officer of the court. Thus the prosecutor was in the position to favor its side, and to hamstring the defense by such devices as failing to produce evidentiary material in its possession, which had been demanded by the defense, or pretending not to be able to locate such material.

Here at home it is unthinkable for men to be tried for crimes and not to be given the chance to point out errors in the trial by an appeal to a higher court. At Nuremberg no appeal or revision was permitted.

How do Senators who are now begging German men to join in the fight like the position those Germans are taking? Perhaps the final answer will not be given in their own lifetimes, but their sons and their daughters are going to be given the answer.

The judgment of the trial court was final. If after the trial, the defense located material evidence which would have aided the defense, it was too late, and it was just too bad for the defense. Of course, we are told that there was an administrative review by the military.

However, since the prosecution was by the military the mechanics of an administrative review must give an obvious appearance of inadequate consideration of possible errors at the trial when contrasted with a judicial review of such errors. As one of the trial judges said:

> In many instances practices have been followed that were not in keeping with our generally accepted concepts of proper administration of justice.

Someone has tried to justify the war-crimes trials as being intended to deter future aggressors. It was said, "We will set such examples, that there will be no more aggressors in the future. We will set an example right here." But today, Mr. President, with our boys dying in Korea we see how ridiculous such a declaration is. The Nuremberg trials have not deterred the Reds in Korea.

These war-crime trials were decided on in Moscow and they were carried on under Moscow principles. These trials were essentially the same as the mass trials held in the 1930's by Stalin when Vishinsky used treason trials to liquidate Stalin's opposition. In Russia Stalin used such trials to liquidate his internal enemies. At Nuremberg the Communists used the war crimes trials to liquidate their external enemies.

It is the Communist's avowed purpose to destroy the Western World which is based on property rights. The war crimes trials were aimed directly at property rights. It was intended to try the accused as aggressors, convict them as having started the war, and then confiscate their property as a penalty.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am interested in the discussion by the Senator, but I notice that repeatedly he has stated that he wants to differentiate between the first Nuremberg trials and the latter Nuremberg trials. I think it would be enlightening to the Senate if the Senator would tell us why he differentiates between them. In other words, why does he differentiate between the first Nuremberg trials and the later Nuremberg trials?

Mr. LANGER. The first Nuremberg trials were tried by Allied courts. The first Nuremberg trials were tried by judges from England, Russia, and other countries. The other trials were conducted by American judges and American prosecutors according to American laws specifically enacted for that purpose. The difference between them was as great as the difference between day and night. For the second Nuremberg trials we sent from all over the United States judges to try between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 Germans who were arrested and tried at what were called the denazification trials.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEHMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LANGER. I yield for a question.

Mr. McCARRAN. Is it not true that we sent some of the highest legal authorities in this country to participate in the first Nuremberg trials?

Mr. LANGER. At the first Nuremberg trials, we were represented by Mr. Biddle, our former Attorney General, who was sent there to be one of the trial justices. We were also represented by Mr. Robert H. Jackson, who went there to be the chief prosecutor. At that time he was one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States.

However, that system was not followed at the second Nuremberg denazification trials. At that time all the judges and all the prosecutors were Americans.

Mr. McCARRAN. I may have misunderstood what the Senator from North Dakota said, but I thought he said that the first Nuremberg trials were tried under Soviet Russia.

Mr. LANGER. No; the Senator from Nevada most certainly misunderstood me. I shall repeat what I said. I said that the war-crimes trials were decided on in Moscow and were carried on under Moscow principles.

Mr. McCARRAN. In that connection, does the Senator distinguish between the first Nuremberg trials and the later Nuremberg trials?

Mr. LANGER. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. In other words, according to the idea of the Senator from North Dakota, the first Nuremberg trials were carried on under the American system of jurisprudence; is that correct?

Mr. LANGER. They were carried on under the joint jurisdiction of the Allies.

Mr. McCARRAN. Was not Russia included?

Mr. LANGER. Yes.

Mr. McCARRAN. Did not Russia dominate there?

Mr. LANGER. I would not say Russia took any greater part than did any other of the Allies. I said that the subsequent Nuremberg trials, the war-crimes trials, were decided on in Moscow and were carried on under Moscow principles. Let me point out that when I speak of "principles" in that connection, I am using the word which is spelled "p-r-i-n-c-i-p-l-e s," rather than the word "p-r-i-n-c-i-p-a-l-s."

Mr. President, as I have said, those trials were essentially the same as the mass trials which were held in the 1930's by Stalin, when Vishinsky used treason trials to liquidate Stalin's opposition. In Russia, Stalin used such trials to liquidate his internal enemies. At Nuremberg the Communists used the war-crimes trials to liquidate their external enemies.

It is the Communists' avowed purpose to destroy the Western World, which is based on property rights. The war-crimes trials were aimed at property rights. It was intended to try the accused as aggressors, convict them of having started a war, and then confiscate their property as a penalty. Thus Moscow hoped to give a death blow to the capitalistic system. Our fellow-travelers and pro-Communist stooges were the dupes, and in some cases were the willing helpers.

Mr. President, in view of the questions my distinguished friend, the Senator from Nevada, has asked, I want him to listen carefully to what I shall say now: If there be any doubt that the war-crimes trials served the purposes of Russia, and did not serve the interests of the West, we need only ask who approved those trials. Senators will find that those war-crimes trials have been most ardently supported by Communist-front organizations, and that the same organizations have been most active in objecting to review by the Clemency Board appointed by High Commissioner McCloy of the errors committed during those trials.

At the original Nuremberg trial, the Russians openly participated. In that case they tried, but failed in the attempt, to establish that the industrialists had been guilty of starting the war. The Russians tried again, during the war-crimes trials, which were held by Americans only. That did not prevent some of the prosecution staff from collaborating with the Russians, with whom they were ideologically in accord. Again the Russians tried to establish that the industrialists as a group, and individually, were guilty of starting the war. Again they failed. In the trials of the industrialists, all the defendants were acquitted of the charge of having committed crimes against the peace. Despite that, the Communist-front organizations and their stooges continued to denounce those industrialists as warmongers. That charge, a pure Moscow invention, is particularly ironic today when we see what is going on in Korea, and when we consider who is responsible. Yet the Moscow stooges have not hesitated to send telegrams of protest to President Truman and High Commissioner McCloy, when he recently released some of the men convicted of war crimes, after the Clemency Board had examined the cases and recommended their release.

I hope my distinguished friend, the Senator from Nevada, will listen carefully, because some 2 weeks ago I submitted a resolution, which now is before his committee, calling for an investigation of the part the Communists played in the Nuremberg war-crimes trials, after the first Nuremberg trials were held.

If the payrolls of the Nuernberg prosecution staff are subpenaed by the Judiciary Committee, headed by the distinguished Senator from Nevada, it will be seen that practically the entire prosecution staff was composed of leftists and men who since then have been exposed as Communists and members of Communist-front organizations. They were, and still are, leftists. The tactics they pursued at Nuremberg were partisan. They were not the sort of tactics we expect to see followed in an American courtroom. They acted under the Moscow principle that the state can do anything to its enemies, and they decided who were those enemies. They were actuated by personal motives, in many cases. Typical was Prosecutor Rapp, in case 12; in a radio address he declared that, as far as he was concerned, his purpose was to tear the masks from the faces of the generals, and that such men could no longer be considered as leaders; that that was his hobby, and was what he intended to prove.

Obviously when the prosecution was composed of men who had such bias, impartial justice could not prevail. That situation and the result were deplorable.

Mr. President, I say to my distinguished friend, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that when the committee holds its hearings, I shall be very glad to have the committee subpena the necessary witnesses and have them brought before the committee, and subpena the payrolls and investigate the names appearing on them, for some of those persons have been Communists and some have been called such by various newspapers in the United States. Regardless of that fact, those persons were called to help in that prosecution.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am most interested in what the Senator has had to say, in view of his vote on the Internal Security Act of 1950.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, if my distinguished friend will wait, I will discuss that with him. I say that because I am afraid my distinguished friend may leave the Chamber while I am speaking.

Let me say that one of the most terrible things that ever happened was the passage by the Senate of the Internal Security Act of 1950, for that act resulted in wrecking the good will on the part of the people of Germany and Austria for the United States, good will which the administration for months and years had built up. No unprejudiced man, who went to those countries, as I did, could help but feel sorrowful at the terrible effect that act had upon the people of Germany and Austria. The American consuls over there told me that before that act was passed 1 out of every 10 persons who applied for a visa to come to the United States was able to obtain one, but that after the passage of that act only 1 out of every 90 persons who tried to get a visa to come to the United States was able to obtain one.

However, that is not all. Mind you, Mr. President, more than 200,000 of those persons had applied to come to the United States, under the quotas; but following the passage of that act, their visas were canceled. Why was that done? At one time at Ellis Island, 1,200 persons were stopped. Some of them were the brides of American soldiers. Some of them had sold their furniture. Many of them had given up their jobs to come here. They were stopped at Ellis Island as the result of passage of the Internal Security Act. After I reached Europe—and I had with me the veto message of President Truman—I said, "How could any man in the United States Senate vote against the President on a measure of this kind?" Here was the President of the United States vetoing the act. What did he do? Whom did he consult? He called in representatives of the Central Intelligence Agency, upon which we spend millions of dollars. The CIA had men in Russia, particularly in Moscow, and they had them in every other country. I met with some of them in Germany and Austria. They said to me, "How in heaven's name could such an act be passed?" I talked with the High Commissioners in Germany and Austria, and they said, "The act has done irreparable injury to the friendly relations existing between the peoples of Austria and Germany and the people of America." In spite of the information furnished by the Central Intelligence Agency and by the representatives of the Department of State, whose ambassadors are in every country, Members of the Senate, three of them at least, have since come to me and said they did not know what in the world they were voting upon. One of them, after he had voted, said to me. "Bill, who are the Volksdeutsch?" He did not even know who they were.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. Does the Senator not know that the Security Act was prepared and passed for the security of America, not for the security of foreign countries? If the Senator is now arguing for the security of foreign countries, he is addressing himself to something other than the internal security of the United States in 1950.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I am glad the distinguished Senator said that, because in my opinion it shows the great ignorance of so many people in America as to where the real security of this country lies. I read a speech by General Omar Bradley, in which he said that the real security of America lies in Germany and in Austria.

Mr. McCARRAN. I am sorry to say——

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield until I have finished. He said, "We have got to have the Germans integrated as a part of our defense of this country." The relationships, in Germany and Austria, according to Mr. McCloy and Mr. Donnelly, were unusually friendly. They were getting along beautifully with those people. Friends of those people had come to America, and more were coming. Relationships were fine. Upon the passage of that act, visas were immediately cancelled, and, as the Senator well knows, thousands and thousands of people were denied admission. It immediately created ill feeling. Mr. President, what would you think if a GI who had fought for 4 years for us and who had married a German girl, and had made all the arrangements to bring her here, suddenly, overnight, found that he could not bring her into this country?

Mr. McCARRAN. But who has the right of determining who shall come into this country—Germany or America?

Mr. LANGER. America, of course.

Mr. McCARRAN. We determined it. But now the Senator from North Dakota wants Germany to determine who shall be admitted.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator from North Dakota wants no such thing. The Senator from North Dakota made his position plain for 2½ years on the very committee of which the Senator is chairman. Time and time again I made my position clear. I was one of those who voted to send the Senator, himself, to Europe, where he spent 2 or 3 months. Let me remind the Senator—although he may have conveniently forgotten it—it was the Senator from North Dakota who backed the Senator when the Senator returned from his European trip. I stood upon the Senate floor to back the Senator in connection with the displaced-persons bill. No one was more eager to provide security for America than the Senator from North Dakota, and, in my opinion, the Senator from Nevada. We fought shoulder to shoulder in that fight, from beginning to end.

The Senator from North Dakota is just as sincere in desiring a continuance of friendly relations with the people of Germany and Austria, whom we need in this battle, according to Gen. Omar Bradley, as is the Senator from Nevada. Certainly, I would never vote for a bill which the President of the United States, in his veto message, in my opinion, clearly demonstrated would do more good than harm to the Communists. That was my opinion. The Senator from Nevada has the right to his opinion. I am not disputing that at all. But I still say that in that veto message, when the President said, "We have 27 laws now dealing with Communists, and we already have 3 more pending, which, if adopted, will solve this entire problem," I still think, in my humble judgment, the President was absolutely right.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator, in giving his excuse, in connection with the vote on the veto message, said that the reason he voted against the bill was so that he would be in a position to move to reconsider.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator will remember that the Senator from North Dakota did not vote until the remainder of the entire membership of the Senate had voted. Then what? I voted for the bill—that is, for the Kilgore substitute. Never forget that it was for the Kilgore substitute that I voted. I said I did so because I wanted to move to reconsider. When the bill came up, and when the Kilgore substitute and all the others were gathered together and put into one package, I was one who spoke against that. I had intended to vote against it, but unfortunately I was in the hospital and did not have an opportunity to vote.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not think the Senator from North Dakota was present when the Kilgore substitute was presented, because it was about 12:30 at night.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator from North Dakota was not only present, but actually voted for it. The RECORD will show I voted for it.

Mr. McCARRAN. What I have in mind is this: I am not criticizing the vote of the Senator, but I am criticizing the fact that the Senator now raises a question about the law, after having told the Senate that his reason for not voting was that he wanted to move a reconsideration. However, he did not move a reconsideration.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator is entirely wrong. The RECORD will speak for itself. The RECORD will show that I voted for the Kilgore substitute. I was present and voted for it. Afterwards, when all the bills were joined together, and when the one-package bill came up, I unfortunately was in the hospital. I had spoken against that bill. I was unable to be present.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I wish to agree with the Senator—he did support me when I was absent, after he had voted to permit me to go to Europe. I am grateful for his vote.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the Senator.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator has been most consistent with me during the years that I have been chairman, and I appreciate his consistency. But, now and then even consistency becomes a little off balance.

Mr. LANGER. I thank the distinguished Senator. I tried to do the best I could on the committee. I hope that at least for a part of the time I was right. Babe Ruth's batting average was only 400. I doubt that I can excel Babe Ruth's average.

I desire to continue with my statement. I was discussing the effect of the Nuremberg trials, and I am not talking about the first trial, where judges from various countries sat, but the one where we had American judges and American prosecutors. Here is what the Germans think about it.

We had hoped that these trials would demonstrate to the Germans the superiority of the Anglo-Saxon way of life and system of justice. Actually the Nuremberg trials have had a tremendous effect on the Germans, but not the effect that was supposedly intended. The Germans know that their leaders were tried for crimes against humanity, including the torture of Germans by Germans. The Germans also know that the Soviet Union has tortured, imprisoned and murdered many times more men than Hitler did, and that nobody has been tried for such crimes against humanity as the murder of some 4,000 Polish officers in Katyn Forest. German generals were tried for rounding up Russian partisans who were interfering with their lines of communication. These generals are supposed to have rounded up these men primarily for the purpose of using them as slave labor. Yet no Russian general has been punished for seizing thousands of German laborers from the east zone. Nor has any American been punished for the inhumanity to man to which thousands of German civilians and war prisoners were subjected by British and American Armed Forces right after the termination of war.

It is now realized fairly generally that the war crimes trials stand in the way of inducing Germans today to be willing to fight on our side against Russia. Thus the trials have resulted in helping Russia and hindering the United States.

The purpose of Moscow for years has been the destruction of the west. Any means, fair or foul, are used. The Kremlin has no ethics; it wants only destruction of its enemy. The Nuremberg trials have helped toward that end. The opposition of the Germans to Russia and to communism centered in its leaders, in its officials, and government workers. To remove political leaders and able and experienced officers in government and big business, automatically weakens the government apparatus in the opponent country, and of course it makes it that much harder for such country to recover. All this serves the interest of Moscow. It does not serve the interests of the United States, which has been compelled to pump money into the German economy to undo the mistakes made at Potsdam.

The war crimes trials were a breach of a long historical tradition of the West. In the past, wars ended with an armistice, which was followed by a peace conference and a peace treaty. In 1918 there was talk of trying the Kaiser as a war criminal. Balfour, of England, questioned whether such trials could be just, and said that neutral judges would have to sit on the court if the world was to be convinced that justice had been done. If the court was composed only of members of the victorious powers, it would be difficult to convince the world that the trials were impartial. Our Secretary Lansing in 1919 refused to issue a list of war criminals who were to be held responsible for the war on the ground that nobody could be tried under this particular charge. Lansing held that the accused could not be tried legally because they were only morally guilty. There was no law which made their actions a crime. In those days the world was conservative, and Moscow was struggling for existence. Moscow has become of age. The bear's appetite has grown with eating. Those who opposed the expansion of Russia, who honestly thought they were defending their country against the Communists, are now accused and tried as war criminals. Again, no one tries the Politburo for doing the same thing for which we have tried and convicted Germans at Nuremberg. The world thus has a clear demonstration that guilt is relative, and that if the criminal is big and powerful enough nothing will happen to him.

Hitler systematically undermined all previous concepts of justice in Germany. We held that this was wrong and fought and defeated Hitler and the Nazis so as to demonstrate that our system was superior. We held the war crimes trials despite the skepticism expressed by leading authorities because we hoped thus to demonstrate the superiority of our concept of justice. Had these trials been conducted by high-caliber men, men motivated by ideals and not by ambition, perhaps we might have succeeded in our purpose. But these trials were not held by men of high ideals. They were run by men animated by ambition or vindictiveness or both. The high purposes have been perverted. The result has been catastrophic.

The Russians are the only ones who profit, because they never have made any pretense of superiority of their system of justice. They have simply liquidated their enemies and rewarded those who work with them. We have convinced the Germans that public opinion and not justice determined court decisions; that collective guilt replaced individual liability; that men have been tried as symbols for representative groups, rather than for things they individually did; that the most able men were picked and tried primarily because they had been able; that so far as the industrialists' trials were concerned, the trials had for their purpose the destruction of German competition, and crippling Germany's effectiveness in world trade for a long time to come, and last, but not least, that the trials were debased from their high purpose by letting newly made Americans of German origin participate for the purpose of personal vindictiveness and revenge.

The Nuremberg trials were sham, not genuine justice. Their purpose was to satisfy feelings of revengefulness, and to fabricate a moral justification for reparation claims, and for changing the economic and political set-up in Germany. Under an ostensible legality the trials were in fact no different from the old-time western frontier lynchings. In Texas and in the far West in the old days it was summarized in the humorous but truthful expression: "Let's give him a fair trial and then hang him." Nuremberg in the minds of most Germans was no different. There, too, the victims were arrested and tried, but the result was often known in advance. If the prosecution had any complaint it was that the judges were not willing to go along fully, that the sentences were in some cases less than the prosecution demanded.

If the war-crimes trials were intended to deter aggressors in the future they have failed. Korea proves this. If they had been properly carried out they would no doubt have contributed further to securing the values which go to make up the American way of life, and what we call western civilization. But the spirit which animated these trials, the manner in which they were conducted, have resulted in the opposite. This should not be surprising when we consider that they served the purposes of Moscow, which is the declared enemy of all rights and values which are at the foundation of our way of life.

That we have failed in achieving the purposes for which the Nuremberg war-crimes trials were held is shown by the action of German workers employed in the Boehm & Voss shipyard, when their chief, Mr. Boehm, was tried for opposing the dismantling of the shipyard. When the defendant was asked to rise before the court pronounced sentence, all the workers in the courtroom also rose, showing that in their opinion the judgment also applied to them. By their action they in effect said: "This judgment is also directed against us." In the same manner the Nuremberg judgments also have affected unnumbered others who were not at Nuremberg, but who felt that the judgments individually affected them. And these are the men whose support we will need if we fight Russia. Certainly we need their support to oppose the growth of communism in Germany. Their support will not be had until they feel that the injustices of the Nuremberg judges are corrected in those cases where the circumstances clearly demand such correction.

Mr. President, consider the foolishness of the Nuremberg trials. Millions of Germans were denazified. All the educated ones were taken. They included scientists, school teachers, and engineers. What did Russia do? Russia had denazification trials also for 3 or 4 weeks, and then stopped. Then Russia got its Communist stooges, including some who had been on the payroll of Communist newspapers in the United States, and put them on the payroll of the United States Government. I saw some of their photographs in Germany. They participated in the trials. While Americans were saying to school teachers, scientists, and engineers, "You cannot work in schoolhouses; you will have to take a shovel and get to work in the ditches by the day," what did Russia do? I am told by Germans that they took 50,000—it may not have been as many as that—of the leading engineers and scientists over to the east zone and put them on the Russian payroll, gave them nice homes in which to live, and said to them, "Continue to develop the submarine which Hitler started. Continue to develop the rocket which Hitler started."

I was given the name of one German scientist who refused and who was promptly executed.

Whether the Department of State is to blame I leave for the American public to judge. But, as there is a war on now with Russia, I say to the Senate of the United States, Mr. President, that some of the weapons used by Russia will be the very weapons that Hitler was fashioning at the time the war ended. Russia got hold of them because of the denazification program.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. A short time ago the Senator from North Dakota made some expressions with reference to the Internal Security Act. He was very vehement in his expressions, no doubt in keeping with his thoughts. I know that the Senator does not choose his companions.

Mr. LANGER. I do not. I believe every Senator votes according to his conscience.

Mr. McCARRAN. It may be interesting to the Senator from North Dakota to know that his expressions with reference to the Internal Security Act are adhered to by all the Communist organizations in the world today.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, all I can say is that if what the distinguished Senator from Nevada says is true—and I do not believe it is true—the previous occupant of the chair, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. LEHMAN], would be in the same category with me. The distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] would be in the same category. So would every other Senator who voted against the Internal Security Act. Some 10 or 11 Senators voted against the act. Leaving myself out entirely, Mr. President, I believe the 10 Senators who voted against the Internal Security Act are as patriotic, as honest, and as much opposed to communism as is the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ]. The Senator from New Mexico is probably the leading Catholic in the Senate. If anyone is opposed to communism certainly it is the average Catholic. The Senator from New Mexico walked into the Senate Chamber after every Senator had voted on the internal security bill, while the votes were being tallied by the clerk, and said, "Mr. President, I want to vote." The Chavez family is one of the leading Catholic families in New Mexico. It was one of the leading families in Old Mexico for 400 years. One ancestor of the distinguished Senator from New Mexico was a President of old Mexico. Another ancestor was the Governor of what is now New Mexico. From this distinguished family have come great clerics and distinguished judges.

The judgment of the Senator from New Mexico is as good as that of any other Senator when it comes to the question of what is or is not communism or communistic. The Senator from New Mexico walked onto the floor of the Senate and said, "Mr. President, I want to vote." When his name was called he voted "nay." If the Senator from New Mexico had been the only Senator to vote against the Internal Security Act I would have said that he voted according to his conscience. He may be right or he may be wrong. The same thing applies to every other Senator. When 11 Senators vote against a bill, the fact that some Communists may agree with them is not evidence that the 11 Senators have any communistic thoughts.

Mr. President, let us take an ordinary case. I believe in the Bank of North Dakota. I believe that public money belongs to the people. I believe that money which belongs to a township, county, or State, should be put into a public bank which is owned by the people themselves. I believe that any interest paid on the money should accrue to the benefit of the people. We have such a bank in North Dakota. We have the Bank of North Dakota. I think it is wrong for a private bank to get public money and put it into its coffers. Sometimes when public money is placed in a private bank one-half of 1 percent or perhaps 1 percent interest is paid on it. The bank turns around and lends that money to the people who own it at 5, 6, 7, or 8 percent interest.

The fact that a Communist may happen to agree with me with respect to the Bank of North Dakota does not mean that I have any Communist leanings. For example, when a former colleague of the Senator from Nevada spoke in favor of gambling in Nevada, he helped his distinguished colleague. He had a perfect right to do that.

Mr. McCARRAN. What is that?

Mr. LANGER. I admire him for doing it.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I cannot hear what the Senator is saying. Does the Senator say I helped gambling?

Mr. LANGER. The distinguished Senator from Nevada certainly helped his former colleague, the former Senator from Nevada, Mr. Bunker, in a speech on the floor of the Senate, because the sentiments expressed by former Senator Bunker were the sentiments of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. Who?

Mr. LANGER. Former Senator Bunker. There was nothing wrong about it. I admire the Senator from Nevada for doing it, if he believed it was a good law for Nevada. If he thought so, it was his duty to speak up. Simply because some Communists—if there were any in Nevada—thought gambling was good for Nevada, we cannot criticize the Senator from Nevada, any more than we should criticize the 10 or 11 Senators who were opposed to the internal-security bill. They should not be condemned or criticized for their position because some Communists or Communist-front organizations believed as they did on the bill.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator from North Dakota misjudged what I said. I said that the Senator from North Dakota is not a chooser of his own companions. However, the position he takes is supported by every Communist organization in the world.

Mr. LANGER. Of course, Mr. President, I cannot speak for all Communist organizations in the world, because I do not know anything about them. I do know that I have made speech after speech on the floor of the Senate—and the Senator from Nevada did not agree with me—in condemning the judges in San Francisco for letting Mr. Harry Bridges, the leading Communist, out on bail. The Senator from Nevada was opposed to me in the case of the bill I introduced. At that time the Communist-front organizations were opposed to me and were in favor of the stand taken by the Senator from Nevada. Therefore, the whole argument simmers down to——

Mr. McCARRAN. I do not know what the Senator is referring to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. To what does the Senator from North Dakota refer?

Mr. LANGER. I am referring to the bill I introduced in the Senate calling for an investigation of the judges who admitted Harry Bridges to bail.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator from Nevada was opposed to it? Is that what the Senator from North Dakota said?

Mr. LANGER. Yes; it is my recollection that the Senator was opposed to it.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator is in error. Not only that, but the committee of which the Senator from Nevada is chairman voted that the Senator from Nevada should appoint a subcommittee to investigate the matter.

Mr. LANGER. The Senator from Nevada states that he was in favor of the bill, and I was delighted to hear him say so. My recollection was that he was opposed to it. However, I am delighted to hear that he joined the Senator from North Dakota in that very great work.

Mr. McCARRAN. He did not join the Senator from North Dakota. He was ahead of him in that respect.

Mr. LANGER. Generally that is true, but on this occasion, in connection with the bill to which I have referred, I was ahead of the Senator from Nevada. I introduced the bill.

Mr. President, I now wish to refer to the matter of Communist penetration in Germany.

Today our State Department and the Kremlin are at war with one another over the radio. We have spent millions for the Voice of America program. It is supposed to inform the people behind the iron curtain about the superiority of our way of life, and to wean them away from Moscow. So far as I could learn the program is effective. It is doing much good. Many listen and are glad to hear facts. A Rumanian farmer born in Rumania in 1873 had lived in Cincinnati until 1910. Two of his children were born and live in the United States. One had been born in Rumania. In 1910 his father died. He returned to Rumania to take over the farm, and remained there until this year. He says the Russians take everything from the small farmer; that men who formerly owned 2,000 acres are now glad to be allowed to work as day laborers on the Danube Canal; that the people eat black bread of poor quality, while the Russians eat bread made from the white flour they take from the peasants; that recently there was a revolt in Hungary; that 84 cars full of men were transported to Siberia, 50 men to each car, and that many had been shot; that the people listen to our radio programs and are waiting for help from the United States to free them from the yoke of Russia; that while Rumanian oil production was plentiful before the Russians came, oil has become scarce there now; that Russian troops were training with tanks and full equipment daily near the village where he lived.

No doubt the men who work on the Voice of America program must know these facts. If I, as a plain traveler, could learn them, surely the State Department through its agents must be even better informed.

The Communists, on the other hand, are not idle. They also broadcast from powerful stations located in Leipzig, Prague, Magdeburg, and other cities in the Russian zone. To overcome their propaganda our stations must of course be equally powerful or more powerful. In this connection, I call attention to another of the many errors of our State Department boys. Some time ago at a conference held in Copenhagen, Denmark, the European radio wave lengths were reallocated. Of course the German areas occupied by the Russians were represented at this conference. But one of our State Department boys made a mistake. We were not represented. I suppose somebody conveniently or deliberately overlooked this meeting. The result was that although our State Department controls the western zone of Germany, and although Munich—or Muenchen, as it is called over there—is in the American zone, the radio wave length of Munich was awarded to the city of Athens, Greece, and so this summer at 8 o'clock at night the Munich radio was silent, but the propaganda from the Russian zone came in full strength. The Germans no longer hear American propaganda, but they hear Russian propaganda, or else they have to shut off their radios. This while we spend millions for the Voice of America program. I have been told that the responsible officials in the State Department were very angry when this happened. I do not know whether the person responsible for this mistake is still on the job. In my opinion he should be fired, but I suppose, like many other fellow travelers and Communists who have been hiding on the payroll, he is still on the job, drawing good pay and neglecting American interests.

Not all the Voice of America programs can be praised. Some have results opposite from what is intended. Or perhaps this opposite result is really intended. Certainly a speech by Ted Williams over the Voice of America on Friday, September 15, 1950, intended to win the Germans to our side in the coming conflict sounded as though it had been written and issued by the Kremlin, rather than by Washington. It certainly did not help win to our side fighters in the coming conflict.

Mr. President, I wish to take up the question of denazification, the subject upon which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] was interrogating me. I am sorry that he has left the Chamber as I go into more detail.

Mr. President, among the policies which have damaged the interests of the United States, the denazification program is in my opinion the worst. Instead of limiting denazification to the active and evil participants and beneficiaries of the Nazi movement, we indiscriminately penalize every German, whether his membership was active or merely nominal.

Mr. President, it is now after 5 o'clock. I very much dislike to discuss this very important subject of denazification with so few Senators present. My speech on that subject will not be long. Let me ask the acting majority leader if it is the plan to take a recess at about 5 o'clock. I should like to resume my speech when more Members of the Senate are present.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Does the Senator wish to place it in the RECORD?

Mr. LANGER. No; I wish to deliver it on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, after the disposition of the pending business, which is the conference report, I may retain the floor tomorrow when the Senate meets at 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent is requested by the senior Senator from North Dakota that he be permitted to retain the floor when the Senate convenes tomorrow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. That is, after the conference report is disposed of tomorrow.

Mr. LANGER. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request of the Senator from North Dakota is that on Tuesday, after the disposition of the conference report, which is now before the Senate, he be recognized. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RECESS

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, December 19, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1950

The House met at 12 oclock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, in this time of national emergency, life for all of us is taking on a new seriousness and a deeper earnestness for we are confronted by dangers which threaten to destroy our liberties

We are beginning to realize that we are citizens of this great Nation, not merely to receive benefits and enjoy the blessings of freedom without hindrance but we must now defend and preserve them at any cost.

Grant that we may be loyal to the memory and tradition of our forefathers who cherished lofty ideals and whose spirit of sternness and simplicity, of struggle and sacrifice, of faith and hope, shone brightly even in the darkest days.

We know that if we are derelict in our devotion or yield to despair we shall be traitors to the faithful of all ages, traitors to our fellow citizens, who are now fighting so valiantly, and traitors to our God.

We pray that we may take more seriously the matter of our personal loyalty to Thee, walking in the ways of righteousness and holding fast the faith that Thy divine purpose cannot be defeated.

Hear us in the name of our blessed Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, December 15, 1950, was read and approved.

LT. COL. CHARLES J. TREES

Mr. BYRNE of New York submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 5244) for the relief of Lt. Col. Charles J. Trees, Army of the United States.

PRAYER AND SUPPLICATION FOR PEACE AND DIVINE GUIDANCE

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, our Christmas joy is shadowed by a solemn sense of gloom, urgency, and emergency. Our Nation has girded itself for action to meet a situation threatening its very existence.

We are all at war, let us make no mistake about that—at war with the most ruthless and diabolical power which has ever cowed the good earth and whose purpose of world domination has been evident now for a long time. This power is acting without conscience and guided by a Godless ideology and is threatening to the very survival of our cherished institutions.

America is the one and only hope of the world. Without us all free peoples would be crushed; ours is an awesome responsibility. In spite of our dire danger this is no time for panic and defeatism. If our Nation throws her all in this global test she is invincible.

Business as usual has been sidetracked and the material resources of this Nation have been mobilized to meet this destructive threat. The fate of the world will be settled by America.

While we are mobilizing our material resources in this hour of danger, we are deeply conscious of the fact that the moral and spiritual resources of our people constitute the Nation's great bulwark in times of national crisis and that the churches of the Nation of all creeds and faiths are the instruments through which our moral and spiritual resources can best be marshaled and given strength. Our greatest weapon is spiritual. America rests on spiritual verities. The spiritual forces of our Nation must be mobilized for this crisis.

I, therefore, introduced in the House on Friday House Resolution 886, calling upon the churches of the Nation of all creeds, beliefs, and faiths to observe, set aside, and dedicate Sunday, December 24, as a time for prayer and supplication for peace and for divine guidance to the men and women, elected and appointed, civilian and military, on whose shoulders rests the responsibility for leadership in this time of great crisis, and for strength and unity to enable our people to persevere, with other freedom-loving people, in bringing about a lasting and permanent peace in the world.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS ARE PATRIOTIC

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I was not on the floor the other day at the moment my friend and distinguished colleague from Illinois [Mr. VELDE] spoke on the subject of the city of Chicago and the State of Illinois. I have since read the context of his remarks as they appear on page 16408 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of December 11, 1950. I have never had occasion of feeling anything but pride in the State of Lincoln and Douglas, of Grant and Logan, of Altgeld and Dunne and Horner, of Oglesby and Yates and Lowden. No State in the Union has more brilliantly proved its loyalty under the test of battle in the war with Mexico, the war of the sixties, the Spanish-American War, and World Wars I and II. Mr. Ellixor Libonati, the national chairman of the Americanization committee of the American Legion, informs me that that great organization, which has gone exhaustively into the problem of communism, places the maximum number of Communists in the entire State of Illinois, including the city of Chicago, at 8,000. I sincerely hope that my distinguished colleague in his zeal for uncovering the misdeeds and the twisted philosophy of the 8,000 did not intend to reflect upon the fine patriotism of the many millions of men and women of Illinois whose love of country is unsurpassed by that obtaining in any State in the Union.

THE JUDITH COPLON TRIAL

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill to correct a situation which, if allowed to continue, may seriously imperil the safety of our country.

This measure would permit the Director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation and certain investigative agencies of the armed services to wire tap or intercept certain communications which they have due cause to believe would produce evidence or lead to the production of evidence by which saboteurs, traitors, and enemy agents might be apprehended and convicted of their crimes against this country.

Under the laws of our land at present, as interpreted by the courts, interception and divulgence of any communication is forbidden. Hence any evidence or information leading to the arrest of a person which has been obtained by means of wire tapping is not admissible in court. As a practical matter, if the FBI and other governmental investigative agencies are to operate efficiently and effectively to protect our national security, they must have the legal right to tap wires. Otherwise, we are saying to spies that they are free to use telephones in their espionage activities, but the Government is forbidden to tap those wires in its counterespionage work. What an absurd and dangerous result.

Of course, indiscriminate wire tapping must not be allowed nor practiced and any grant of authority to use these measures to apprehend specific types of criminals must be hedged about with strict protective measures so that the civil rights of our citizens shall be guarded at all times. Thus, it is provided in the measure I have suggested that before intercepting communications, the investigational agency must obtain a permit from a Federal judge upon a showing of reasonable cause to believe that the communications may contain information which would assist in the conduct of such investigations.

But the recent case of Judith Coplon points up the present unfortunate predicament very clearly. Since the FBI had used the means of wire tapping to obtain evidence against her, the Second Circuit Court of Appeals felt compelled to rule against the Government, although, as the court decision said, her guilt was clear.

I fully realize that the time may be too short at this session to complete action on such a bill, but I intend to reintroduce a similar bill in the next Congress, since I am convinced that such authorized, limited use of wire tapping is an indispensable weapon in our fight to protect fully our national security. Speedy enactment of this or similar legislation is essential. We must not tie the hands of our investigative agencies in safeguarding our country against enemy spies.

RETIREMENT OF HON. CHARLES A. PLUMLEY

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Speaker, circumstances over which I have no control may determine the early hour of my departure from these Halls and these surroundings and from my friends on both sides of the aisle. May I be privileged in these hours of terrific personal responsibility which I shirk, to hope and pray for each and every one of you, and all of us, that for now and forever the day may break and all shadows flee.

That is the symposium of the responsibility of those of you who must see to it that democracy survives. God love you as I leave you.

SEXUAL PERVERTS IN GOVERNMENT EMPLOY

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I have just read an article about the number of sexual perverts in the employ of the Government. I never thought there were so many homosexuals in the whole United States. According to the article, the committee that has been investigating this matter has found that 574 such persons have quit their jobs and that 420 have been fired. Does it not amaze you to think of all these people they have in the Government? What we need is a thorough housecleaning and the quicker the better.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 10 minutes today, tomorrow, and Wednesday, at the conclusion of the legislative program and following any special orders heretofore entered.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WICKERSHAM asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a radio address.

Mr. BAILEY (at the request of Mr. WIER) was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article from the Clarksburg News, of Clarksburg, W. Va.

Mr. BONNER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances, in one to include a digest of the inaugural address of President Gordon Gray, of the consolidated University of North Carolina; and in the other to include a newspaper article on the anniversary of the Wright inaugural flight at Kitty Hawk, N. C.

Mr. CARNAHAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include newspaper items.

Mr. ELLIOTT asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. BENTSEN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

Mr. HAYS of Ohio asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a newspaper article.

Mr. HUBER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include two newspaper articles.

Mr. O'HARA of Minnesota asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in seven instances and include in one an address by William L. Hutchinson.

Mr. COTTON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. HARVEY asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial appearing in the Indianapolis News.

Mr. CLEVENGER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include editorials.

Mr. FORD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include two editorials.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a copy of a letter from the manager of the Veterans' Administration regional office of Milwaukee.

Mr. McCORMACK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include certain information.

Mr. RICH asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article appearing in the Times-Herald entitled "Perverts in Official Agencies Called Peril to the United States Security."

Mr. HARRISON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial.

EMERGENCY RELIEF ASSISTANCE TO YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 4234) to promote the foreign policy and provide for the defense and general welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. 3204)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4234) to promote the foreign policy and provide for the defense and general welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That this Act may be cited as the 'Yugoslav Emergency Relief Assistance Act of 1950.'

"SEC. 2. The President is hereby authorized to expend not in excess of $50,000,000 of the funds heretofore appropriated for expenses necessary to carry out the provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended (Public Law 759, Eighty-first Congress), for the purpose of providing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia under the authority of this Act.

"SEC. 3. No assistance under authority of this Act shall be made available nor shall any funds appropriated hereunder be expended until an agreement is entered into between Yugoslavia and the United States containing the following undertakings, and any others the President may determine to be desirable, on the part of Yugoslavia:

"(a) To make available to the Government of the United States local currency in amounts required by it to meet its local currency administrative and operating expenses in Yugoslavia in connection with assistance supplied under this Act.

"(b) To give full and continuous publicity through the press, radio, and all other available media in Yugoslavia to the assistance furnished by the United States; and to allow to the United States, in cooperation with Yugoslavia, the use of such media as may be required to accomplish this purpose.

"(c) To permit persons designated by the Government of the United States to observe and supervise without restriction the distribution by Yugoslavia of commodities and other assistance made available under the authority of this Act, and to the extent necessary for this purpose to permit full freedom of movement of such persons within Yugoslavia and full access to communication and information facilities.

"(d) To make equitable distribution to the people in Yugoslavia of the commodities made available under this Act, as well as similar commodities produced locally or imported from outside sources, without discrimination as to race or political or religious belief.

"(e) Whenever relief supplies furnished under this Act are sold for local currency by the Government of Yugoslavia, to use an equivalent amount of such currency to provide relief to needy persons and to children, and for charitable, medical, and such other purposes as may be mutually agreed upon.

"(f) To take all appropriate economic measures to reduce its relief needs, to encourage increased production and distribution of food stuffs within Yugoslavia, and to lessen the danger of similar future emergencies.

"SEC. 4. All of the funds made available under authority of this Act shall be utilized to the fullest practicable extent in the purchase of the commodities from the surplus commodities in the possession of the Commodity Credit Corporation at prices authorized by section 112 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, as amended.

"SEC. 5. Nothing in this Act shall be interpreted as endorsing measures undertaken by the present Government of Yugoslavia which suppress or destroy religious, political, and economic liberty, and the Yugoslav Government shall be so notified when aid is furnished under this act.

"SEC. 6. At the termination of each three-month period after aid has been extended under this Act the Secretary of State shall make a full and detailed report to the Congress. Said three-month reports shall not be limited to, but shall include (1) information as to whether or not Yugoslavia is abiding by the agreement as provided for under section 3 of this Act: (2) information as to any developments in the attitude of Yugoslavia with respect to basic human rights.

"SEC. 7. All or any portion of the funds made available under authority of this Act may be transferred by the President to any department or agency of the executive branch of the Government to be expended for the purpose of this Act. Funds so transferred may be expended under the authority of any provisions of law, not inconsistent with this Act, applicable to the departments or agencies concerned, except that funds so transferred shall not be commingled with other funds of such departments or agencies and shall be accounted for separately.

"SEC. 8. Local currency made available to the United States by Yugoslavia under the provisions of the agreement required by section 3 may be used for local currency administrative and operating expenses in Yugoslavia in connection with assistance provided by this Act without charge against appropriated funds.

"SEC. 9. At least 50 per centum of the gross tonnage of any equipment, materials, or commodities made available under the provisions of this Act and transported on ocean vessels (computed separately for dry bulk carriers and dry cargo liners) shall be transported on United States-flag commercial vessels at market rates for United States-flag commercial vessels, if available.

"SEC. 10. All or any part of the assistance provided hereunder shall be promptly terminated by the President—

"(a) whenever he determines that (1) Yugoslavia is not complying fully with the undertakings in the agreement entered into under section 3 of this Act, or is diverting from the purpose of this Act assistance provided hereunder; or (2) because of changed conditions, continuance of assistance is unnecessary or undesirable, or no longer consistent with the national interest or the foreign policy of the United States;

"(b) whenever the Congress, by concurrent resolution, finds termination is desirable.

"Termination of assistance to Yugoslavia under this section shall include the termination of deliveries of all supplies scheduled under this Act and not yet delivered."

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4234), to furnish emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the committee of conference and recommended in the accompanying conference report.

The House struck out all of the Senate bill after the enacting clause and inserted a substitute amendment. The committee of conference has agreed to a substitute for both the Senate bill and the House amendment. Except for the differences noted below and except for clarifying, clerical, and necessary conforming changes the conference substitute is the same as the House version.

The preamble: The House amendment contained a preamble, pointing out that Yugoslavia has urgently requested relief because of a drought and that it has expressed an intention to conform to its obligations as a member nation of the United Nations. The Senate bill contained no such preamble. The conference agreement strikes out this language. In the opinion of the committee of conference the legislative history of the bill is clear that the first idea expressed here is already part of the legislation. The second idea is not sufficiently established as a fact to include it in this bill.

The "counterpart" provision: One of the conditions of aid is that whenever relief supplies are furnished by the United States under this act and are sold for local currency in Yugoslavia, the Government of Yugoslavia must undertake to use an equivalent amount of such currency to provide relief to needy persons and to children and for charitable, medical, and such other purposes as may be agreed upon between Yugoslavia and the United States. This provision was not in the House amendment. The House receded.

The theory of this provision is contained in a number of acts of Congress providing relief and assistance to foreign countries, such as Public Law 84, Eightieth Congress, and the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, as amended. It has become known as the "counterpart" principle.

One of the purposes of this provision is to make every dollar of United States assistance count for as much as possible. This provision makes the American dollar do double duty. One of the important elements in the consideration of the bill in the House was the concern that United States assistance reach all those who need it and that the United States get the maximum return from the use of its resources.

Appropriate economic measures by Yugoslavia: Another undertaking by Yugoslavia set forth in the House version was its agreement to take all necessary actions to reduce its relief needs, to encourage increased production and distribution of foodstuffs within Yugoslavia, and to lessen the danger of similar future emergencies. This was not in the Senate version. It was the view of the House in adopting this provision that relief from the United States was only half of the picture. Action by the United States could be effective only if supplemented by self-help measures by Yugoslavia to meet its own crisis. The words "necessary actions" in the House version were designed to make the self-help feature of the program explicit. It was the view of the committee of conference, in adopting the language "appropriate economic measures," that this phrase more nearly conforms to this purpose. The language of the conference agreement paraphrases the language of Public Law 84, Eightieth Congress, in this respect. The requirement as now expressed in the conference agreement thus conforms to part practice.

The cost formula for the purchase of commodities: The House version provided that the funds appropriated for the Yugoslav program shall be utilized as far as possible in the purchase of surplus commodities held by the Government. The purchase price was defined as "at Government cost". The Senate bill contained no such provision. The conference agreement provides that the price formula governing the sale of surplus commodities shall be the same as that already contained in section 112 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, as amended.

The House version required a price formula at variance with existing law under which surplus commodities have been furnished for foreign relief programs since 1948. The effect of the House language was to require an entirely different pricing arrangement than that now prevailing for ECA and any other foreign assistance program. The conference agreement makes it certain that this program will not receive any preferential treatment. It brings this program into line with the procedure already approved by the Congress on previous occasions.

Ocean transportation: Both the House and Senate versions contained the provision requiring that at least 50 percent of the gross tonnage of the aid supplied under the bill be transported on United States flag commercial vessels. The major point of difference concerned the words "if available" which were in the Senate version but not in the House version. The House receded. The absence of these words could result in a situation where shipment of the supplies might be held up because sufficient United States flag commercial vessels were not available. The retention of the words "if available" removes this possibility and affords greater flexibility.

MIKE MANSFIELD,
CHARLES A. EATON,
JOHN M. VORYS,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, may I say for the information of the House that there were few important differences between the Senate bill and the House bill, and I believe I will be joined in this statement by the ranking minority Member on the other side.

I see no reason for extended debate on the conference report. It speaks for itself.

Mr. VORYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDS. I yield.

Mr. VORYS. This is a unanimous conference report, is it not?

Mr. RICHARDS. That is correct.

Mr. VORYS. The bill now reflects the so-called counterpart funds principle in the Fulbright amendment, providing that when relief supplies are sold for local currency, an equivalent amount of such currency shall be used for mutually agreed purposes. Is that not correct?

Mr. RICHARDS. The bill contains at least part of the principle for which the gentleman from Ohio fought on the floor of the House the other day. It provides a local currency fund for relief to needy persons, children, and for charitable and medical purposes.

Mr. VORYS. In any case it contains the so-called Fulbright amendment?

Mr. RICHARDS. That is correct.

Mr. VORYS. And it also preserves the House amendment on self-help, with clarifying changes, which would require appropriate economic measures to reduce relief needs, such as marking time on collectivization while this program is going on?

Mr. RICHARDS. That is substantially correct.

Mr. VORYS. I think it is a better bill than when it left the House floor, and I approve of the conference report.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GRANTING VETERANS' PREFERENCE TO MOTHERS OF CERTAIN VETERANS

The Clerk called the bill (S. 3263) to amend Veterans' Preference Act of 1944 with respect to certain mothers of veterans.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the Veterans' Preference Act of 1944, as amended (5 U. S. C. 851), is amended by striking out clauses 5 and 6 and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "(5) mothers of deceased ex-servicemen or ex-servicewomen who lost their lives, under honorable conditions while on active duty in any branch of the Armed Forces of the United States during any war, or in any campaign or expedition (for which a campaign badge has been authorized), or of service-connected permanently and totally disabled ex-servicemen or ex-servicewomen who were separated from such Armed Forces under honorable conditions if—

(A) the father is totally and permanently disabled, or

(B) the mother was widowed, divorced, or separated from the father and—

(1) has not remarried, or

(2) has remarried but (i) her husband is totally and permanently disabled or (ii) she is divorced or legally separated from her husband or such husband is dead at the time preference is claimed."

SEC. 2. (a) Section 3 of such act, as amended, is amended by striking out "(5) and (6)" and inserting in lieu thereof "and (5)"

(b) Section 10 of such act is amended by striking out "(5) and (6)" and inserting in lieu thereof "and (5)."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ACCUMULATION OF COMPENSATORY TIME IN THE POSTAL SERVICE

The Clerk called the bill (S. 3654) to amend section 3 of the Postal Salary Act of July 6, 1945.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 of the act entitled "An act to reclassify the salaries of postmasters, officers, and employees of the Postal Service; to establish uniform procedures for computing compensation; and for other purposes," approved July 6, 1945 (59 Stat. 435), as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. (a) When the needs of the service require employees to perform service on Saturdays, Sundays, or holidays, such employees shall be allowed compensatory time for such service on 1 day within 5 working days next succeeding the Saturday or Sunday and within 30 days next succeeding the holiday.

"(b) If the service so performed on Saturdays and Sundays is less than 8 hours, such service may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be carried forward and combined with similar service performed on other Saturdays and Sundays, and such employees may be allowed compensatory time for such combined service or any part thereof at any time, except that, whenever at least 8 hours of such service has been accumulated, such employees shall be allowed 8 hours compensatory time on 1 day within 5 working days next succeeding the Saturday or Sunday on which the total accumulated service was at least 8 hours.

"(c) The Postmaster General may, if the exigencies of the service require, authorize the payment of overtime to employees other than supervisory employees whose base salaries, exclusive of longevity salary, are more than $4,170 per annum, for services performed on Saturdays, Sundays, and Christmas Day during the month of December, in lieu of compensatory time.

"(d) Supervisory employees shall be allowed compensatory time for services performed in excess of 8 hours per day, and those whose base salaries, exclusive of longevity salary, are more than $4,170 per annum shall be allowed compensatory time for services performed on Saturdays, Sundays, and on Christmas Day during the month of December, within 180 days from the days such service was performed.

"(e) The provisions of this section shall shall not apply to employees in the Postal Transportation Service; post-office inspectors; rural carriers; traveling mechanicians; examiners of equipment and supplies; clerks in third-class post offices; and employees paid on an houly basis."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

INCLUDING TEMPORARY EMPLOYEES OF SENATE AND HOUSE UNDER PROVISIONS OF CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT ACT

The Clerk called the bill (S. 3672) to amend section 3 (c) of the Civil Service Retirement Act so as to make the exclusion from such act of temporary employees of the Senate and House of Representatives inapplicable to such employees with one or more years of service.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 3 (c) of the Civil Service Retirement Act of May 29, 1930, as amended by section 3 of the act of January 24, 1942, as amended, is further amended by inserting after the words "The provisions of this act shall not apply to employees of the Senate or the House of Representatives whose employment is temporary or of uncertain duration" the words "unless and until such employees shall have served continuously in such employment for at least 1 year: Provided, That chairmen of committees shall give notice in writing to the disbursing office concerned on or before the date when the services of such employees are to commence or terminate, or when salary changes are to become effective."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ASSIGNMENT OF SURPLUS CLERKS IN THE POSTAL TRANSPORTATION SERVICE

The Clerk called the bill (S. 3910) relating to the assignment of surplus clerks in the postal transportation service.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the paragraph headed "Railway Mail Service" in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1917, as amended, is amended by inserting after the second proviso thereof (62 Stat. 575; 39 U. S. C. 632) the following: "Provided further, That when a surplus clerk cannot be placed in a position of his grade without giving him preference over a clerk with a longer continuous postal transportation service record, he may be relegated to a lower-grade position in his own organization or transferred elsewhere to any grade that may be available for a regular clerk of his standing, under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONTRACTS FOR TRANSMISSION OF MAIL BY PNEUMATIC TUBES

The Clerk called the bill (S. 4102) relating to contracts for the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other mechanical devices.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General may enter into contracts, for terms not exceeding 10 years, for the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other mechanical devices.

SEC. 2. Contracts for the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other mechanical devices shall be subject to the provisions of laws relating to the letting of mail contracts, except as otherwise provided in this act. Advertisements shall state in general terms only the requirements of the service and shall be in the form best calculated to invite competitive bidding. The Postmaster General may reject any and all bids. No contract shall be awarded except to the lowest responsible bidder tendering full and sufficient guaranties to the satisfaction of the Postmaster General of his ability to perform satisfactory service.

SEC. 3. In the city of New York, including the Borough of Brooklyn, the annual rate of expenditure for the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes shall not exceed $15,500 per mile per annum of double line pneumatic-tube facilities for a period of 10 years, after which time the annual rate of expenditures per mile shall not exceed $12,000. This rate shall be inclusive of maintenance expenses but shall be exclusive of all operating expenses.

SEC. 4. All laws or parts of laws inconsistent or in conflict with this act are hereby repealed. This shall include, but is not limited to, the following laws:

(a) The provisions of the acts of April 21, 1902; March 2, 1907; May 27, 1908; and June 19, 1922 (39 U. S. C. 423), relating to contracts for transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes; and

(b) The act entitled "An act to provide for certain administrative expenses in the Post Office Department, including retainment of pneumatic-tube systems, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1948 (62 Stat. 1163).

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING RELIEF OF CERTAIN AUTHORIZED CERTIFYING OFFICERS

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 9828) to authorize relief of authorized certifying officers of terminated war agencies in liquidation by the Department of Labor.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of authorized certifying officers of terminated war agencies, in process of liquidation by the Department of Labor at the time of the enactment of this act, for the amounts of suspensions and disallowances, which have been, or may be, raised by the General Accounting Office on account of payments made in accordance with vouchers certified by such certifying officers: Provided, That the Secretary of Labor or his authorized representative shall certify that in his opinion there is no evidence of fraud or collusion on the part of the certifying officers in connection with the payments.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. That is the last eligible bill on the calendar.

REDEFINING ELIGIBILITY FOR MEMBERSHIP IN THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (S. 4240) to amend the act incorporating the American Legion so as to redefine eligibility for membership therein, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5 of the act approved September 16, 1919 (41 Stat. 285; U. S. C. of 1946, title 36, sec. 45), entitled "An act to incorporate The American Legion," as amended, is hereby further amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5. That no person shall be a member of this corporation unless he served in the naval or military services of the United States at some time during any of the following periods: April 6, 1917, to November 11, 1918; December 7, 1941, to September 2, 1945; June 25, 1950, to the date of cessation of hostilities, as determined by the United States Government; all dates inclusive, or, who being citizens of the United States at the time of entry therein, served in the military or naval services of any of the governments associated with the United States during said wars or hostilities: Provided, however, That such person shall have an honorable discharge or separation from such service or continues to serve honorably after any of the aforesaid terminal dates."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

ELIGIBILITY FOR MEMBERSHIP IN AMVETS

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 4254) to redefine eligibility for membership in AMVETS—American Veterans of World War II.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of the act approved July 23, 1947, Public Law 216, Eightieth Congress (61 Stat. 407; 36 U. S. C. 67e), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. Any person who served in the Armed Forces of the United States of America or any American citizen who served in the armed forces of an allied nation of the United States on or after September 16, 1940, and before the legal termination of World War II, is eligible for regular membership in AMVETS, provided such service when terminated by discharge or release from active duty be by honorable discharge or separation. No person who is a member of, or who advocates the principles of, any organization believing in, or working for, the overthrow of the United States Government by force, and no person who refuses to uphold and defend the Constitution of the United States, shall be privileged to become, or continue to be, a member of this organization."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TO AMEND INTERNAL REVENUE CODE AND FEDERAL ALCOHOL ADMINISTRATION ACT

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 3229) to amend the Internal Revenue Code, as amended, and the Federal Alcohol Administration Act, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2806 (d) of the Internal Revenue Code, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(d) All distilled spirits found in any cask or package, and any bottled distilled spirits found in any case, without having upon such cask or package or case each mark and stamp required therefor by law or regulations, shall be forfeited to the United States."

SEC. 2. Section 4 of the Federal Alcohol Administration Act (U. S. C., title 27, sec. 204) is amended in the following respects:

(1) Subsection (d) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) A basic permit shall be conditioned upon (1) compliance with the requirements of section 5 of this act (relating to unfair competition and unlawful practices) and of section 6 of this act (relating to bulk sales and bottling), with the twenty-first amendment and laws relating to the enforcement thereof, and with all other Federal laws relating directly or indirectly to distilled spirits, wine, and malt beverages, including taxes with respect thereto, and (2) conduct of the operations under such permit in conformity with the laws of the State in which such operations are conducted."

(2) Clause 1 of subsection (e), is amended by striking out ", provided that for a first violation of the conditions thereof the permit shall be subject to suspension only."

(3) Subsection (g) is amended to read as follows:

"(g) A basic permit may be issued for 1 year and shall expire on the 31st day of December next succeeding the issuance thereof unless suspended, revoked, or annulled as provided herein, or voluntarily surrendered: Provided, That the Secretary may without formal application extend any permit granted under this part after August 31, in any year to December 31 of the succeeding year. (1) If leased, sold, or otherwise voluntarily transferred, the permit shall be automatically terminated thereupon, and (2) if transferred by operation of law or if actual or legal control of the permittee is acquired, directly or indirectly, whether by stock ownership or in any other manner, by any person, then such permit shall be automatically terminated at the expiration of 30 days thereafter: Provided, That if within such 30-day period application for a new basic permit is made by the transferee or permittee, respectively, then the outstanding basic permit shall continue in effect until such application is finally acted on by the Secretary of the Treasury."

(4) The second sentence of subsection (h) is amended to read as follows: "Such appeal shall be taken by filing, in the district court of the United States within any district wherein such person resides or has his principal place of business, or in the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, within 60 days after the entry of such order, a written petition praying that the order of the Secretary be modified or set aside in whole or in part."; and the next to the last sentence thereof is repealed.

(5) Subsection (i) is amended to read as follows: "(i) No basic permit shall be suspended or revoked for a violation of any condition thereof relating to compliance with Federal law if the alleged violation of a Federal law has been compromised by any officer of the Government authorized to compromise such violation."

SEC. 3. All basic permits issued pursuant to the provisions of the Federal Alcohol Administration Act, as amended (Public, No. 401, approved August 29, 1935; U. S. C., 1940 ed., title 27, ch. 8, sec. 201 and the following), prior to the approval of this act shall expire on the 31st day of December 1947: Provided, That if this act is approved after August 31, 1947, the Secretary may, without formal application, extend any such permit to December 31, 1948. Provided further, That before the expiration date of any such permit it may be terminated, or, upon notice and hearing, suspended, revoked, or annulled as provided in the said Federal Alcohol Administration Act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 5, strike out "section 5 of this act (relating to unfair competition and unlawful practices) and of section 6 of this act (relating to bulk sales and bottling)" and insert in lieu thereof "the Federal Alcohol Administration Act."

Page 4, line 8, strike out "1947" and insert "1951" and strike out the balance of line 8, and 9, 10, and 11, down to and including "Provided further."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

WAR DAMAGE CORPORATION

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 9802) to grant succession to the War Damage Corporation.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understand this is the same bill we had during the Second World War?

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill that reactivates the War Damage Corporation. It has been reported unanimously by the committee, in response to a general demand of the people, both on the west coast and the east coast. We have had many, many telegrams and letters urging that this organization be reactivated in order that the people may secure insurance they otherwise could not secure against war damage.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. My question was if the bill is exactly the same as the previous bill.

Mr. SPENCE. It is substantially the same, except for a few clarifying amendments that we would like to have considered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "War Damage Corporation Act of 1950."

SEC. 2. Notwithstanding the Government Corporation Control Act or the charter of the War Damage Corporation, the War Damage Corporation (hereinafter referred to as the "Corporation") shall have succession for the objects and purposes set forth in section 3. The Corporation shall not have succession beyond July 1, 1955, except for purposes of liquidation, unless it is extended beyond such date pursuant to an act of Congress.

SEC. 3. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is directed to supply funds to the Corporation. Such funds shall be supplied only upon the request of the President and the aggregate amount of the funds so supplied shall not exceed $1,000,000,000, exclusive of capital stock subscribed prior to the date of the enactment of this act. The Corporation is authorized to use its funds to provide, through insurance, reinsurance, or otherwise, reasonable protection against loss of or damage to property, real and personal, which may result from—

(a) hostile or warlike action in time of peace or war (including action in hindering, combatting, or defending against an actual, impending or expected attack) (1) by any government or sovereign power (de jure or de facto) or any authority using military, naval, or air forces; or (2) by military, naval, or air forces; or (3) by an agent of any such government, power authority, or forces; or

(b) the discharge, explosion, or use of any weapon of war employing atomic fission or radioactive force; with such general exceptions as the Corporation, with the approval of the President, may deem advisable. Such protection shall be made available upon the payment of such premium or other charge, and subject to such terms and conditions, as the Corporation, with the approval of the President, may establish, but, in view of the national interest involved, the Corporation shall from time to time establish uniform rates for each type of property with respect to which such protection is made available, and, in order to establish a basis for such rates, the Corporation shall estimate, from time to time, the average risk of loss on all property of such type in the United States. Such protection shall be applicable only (1) to such property situated in the United States (including the several States and the District of Columbia), the Canal Zone, the Territories and possessions of the United States, and in such other places as may be determined by the President, for the purposes of this act, to be under the dominion and control of the United States; (2) to such property in transit between any points located in any of the foregoing; and (3) to all bridges and tunnels between the United States and Canada and between the United States and Mexico: Provided, That such protection shall not be applicable to property in transit upon which any agency of the Government is authorized to provide marine war-risk insurance. The Corporation, with the approval of the President, may suspend, restrict, or otherwise limit such protection in any area to the extent that it may determine to be necessary or advisable in consideration of the loss of control of such area by the United States making it impossible or impracticable to provide such protection in such area. The Corporation, with the approval of the President, may provide such limitations and general exceptions with respect to classes of property protected and other matters as the Corporation may deem necessary or desirable.

SEC. 4. The Corporation shall have the following general powers in carrying out the objects and purposes set forth in section 3:

(1) To amend its charter insofar as is necessary to carry out the objects, purposes, and general powers set forth in sections 3 and 4.

(2) To adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal, which shall be judicially noticed.

(3) To adopt, amend, and repeal bylaws, governing the conduct of its business, and the performance of the powers and duties granted to or imposed upon it by law.

(4) To sue and be sued in its corporate name in any court of competent jurisdiction.

(5) To determine the character of and the necessity for its obligations and expenditures and the manner in which they shall be incurred, allowed, and paid, subject to the laws applicable specifically to Government corporations.

(6) To acquire, in any lawful manner, any property—real, personal, or mixed, tangible or intangible—to hold, maintain, use, and operate the same; and to sell, lease, or otherwise dispose of the same, whenever any of the foregoing transactions are deemed necessary or appropriate to the conduct of the activities authorized by this act, and on such terms as may be prescribed by the Corporation.

(7) To execute all instruments necessary or appropriate in the exercise of any of its functions.

(8) To use the United States mails in the same manner and under the same conditions as the executive departments of the Federal Government.

(9) To settle and adjust claims held by it against other persons or parties and by other persons or parties against the Corporation.

(10) To borrow, hypothecate, and to invest and reinvest its funds.

(11) To appoint such officers, agents, attorneys, and employees as may be necessary for the conduct of the business of the Corporation; and to delegate to them such powers and to prescribe for them such duties as may be deemed appropriate by the Corporation.

(12) To take such actions as may be necessary or appropriate to carry out the powers and duties herein or hereafter specifically granted to or imposed upon it.

SEC. 5. The Corporation, including its franchise, its capital, reserves, surplus, and income, shall be exempt from all taxation (which shall, for all purposes, be deemed to include sales, use, storage, and purchase taxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States, or any Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority, except that any real property (or buildings which are considered by the laws of any State to be personal property for taxation purposes) of the Corporation shall be subject to State, Territorial, county, municipal, or local taxation to the same extent according to its value as other real property is taxed.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "act", insert "The Corporation shall pay interest to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on such funds, including those realized from capital stock, at a rate commensurate with that charged on borrowings by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation from the Treasury."

Page 2, line 16, after the word "which", strike out the balance of line 16, all of lines 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24, and on page 3, lines 1, 2, 3, and 4, down to and including the word "advisable" and insert "may result from hostile or warlike action, including action in hindering, combating, or defending against an actual, impending or expected attack, (1) by any government or sovereign power (de jure or de facto), or by any authority using military, naval, or air forces; or (2) by military, naval, or air forces; or (3) by an agent of any such government, power, authority, or forces; with such general exceptions as the Corporation, with the approval of the President, may deem advisable."

"SEC. 6. The Corporation shall contribute to the Civil Service Retirement and Disability Fund, on the basis of annual billings as determined by the Civil Service Commission, for the Government's share of the cost of the Civil Service Retirement System applicable to the Corporation's employees. The Corporation shall also contribute to the Employee's Compensation Fund, on the basis of annual billings as determined by the Federal Security Administrator, for the benefit payments made from such fund on account of the Corporation's employees. The annual billings shall also include a statement of the fair portion of the cost of the administration of the respective funds, which shall be paid by the Corporation into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SPENCE. I offer the following amendments, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. SPENCE:

Page 2, at the end of line 7, after "subscribed", insert "and paid in."

Page 6, line 13, change the period to a semicolon and insert the following: "Provided, however, That all employees on the payroll of the Corporation shall have been appointed and shall be compensated in accordance with the Civil Service Act and the Classification Act of 1949."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it shall be in order on Wednesday next to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9798) as amended, to authorize the Federal civil defense, and for other purposes, and that there be not exceeding 2 hours' general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM] and one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT]; that at the close of the general debate the bill will be open for amendment under the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, as I understand the request, this is simply to avoid the necessity of going to the Rules Committee. Otherwise, all the interests of the House are protected?

Mr. VINSON. The gentleman from Massachusetts in stating the case is exactly correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

CONSTRUCTION AT MILITARY AND NAVAL INSTALLATIONS

Mr. VINSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it shall be in order on Wednesday next to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9893) to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, as amended; that there shall be not to exceed 1 hour's general debate to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] and by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] and that the bill shall then be read under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. NICHOLSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this matter coming up the same day civilian defense is taken up?

Mr. VINSON. That is the request I am making. I am hoping we can dispose of both bills on Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

STUDY OF HEALTH OF WORLD WAR II PRISONERS OF WAR

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 8848) to provide for a study of the mental and physical sequelae of malnutrition and starvation suffered by prisoners of war and civilian internees during World War II.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how much will this proposal cost the taxpayers?

Mr. RANKIN. Not over $75,000.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Just what will it do?

Mr. RANKIN. This bill provides for a study of the health of prisoners of war of World War II to be coordinated by the War Claims Commission.

The actual medical research would be done by the Veterans' Administration, the Public Health Service, the Surgeons General of the Armed Forces, and possibly private agencies in an effort to determine the result of malnutrition and starvation upon these men and how it affects their later life. The information obtained would be most helpful in evaluating future claims of these men.

The total cost is estimated to be for this project approximately $75,000.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Just how urgent is this matter?

Mr. RANKIN. It has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Just what is the urgency about the bill?

Mr. RANKIN. The war has been over for 5 years. If we are going to get any benefit from a study of this kind we should get at it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

VOCATIONAL REHABILITATION OF VETERANS

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 9900) to extend to certain persons who served in the military, naval, or air service on or after June 27, 1950, the benefits of Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, a similar bill has been passed by the Senate, S. 4299, to extend to certain persons who served in the military, naval, or air service on or after June 27, 1950, the benefits of Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate bill may be substituted in lieu of the House bill.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the Senate bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That service in the active military, naval, or air service of the United States on or after June 27, 1950, and prior to such date as shall thereafter be determined by Presidential proclamation or concurrent resolution of the Congress, shall afford basic entitlement to vocational rehabilitation under Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended, needed to overcome the handicap of a disability incurred in or aggravated by such service for which compensation is payable under the provisions of subparagraph I (c), part II, Veterans Regulation No. 1 (a), as amended (or would be but for receipt of retirement pay), subject to the applicable provisions, conditions, and limitations of Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended, except as follows:

(1) Vocational rehabilitation based on service as prescribed in this act may be afforded within 9 years after the aforesaid termination of the period beginning June 27, 1950.

(2) Notwithstanding the fact that vocational rehabilitation may have been previously afforded under Public Law No. 16, as amended, or that education or training may have been afforded under title II of the Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944, as amended, additional vocational rehabilitation may be provided hereunder to the extent necessary by reason of a handicap due to disability incurred in or aggravated by service, as provided herein.

(3) Any person eligible for vocational rehabilitation under this act who, at the time of such service, was not a citizen of the United States, shall be afforded such benefit only while a resident of a State, Territory, or possession of the United States or of the District of Columbia.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider and the bill H. R. 9900 were laid on the table.

GRATUITOUS INDEMNITY FOR ALL MEMBERS OF ARMED FORCES

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 9911) to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I think the chairman of the committee should advise the House as to the full provisions of this bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides a gratuitous indemnity in the amount of $10,000 to the survivors of all men killed in the Armed Forces on and after June 27, 1950, without cost to the serviceman.

In addition, the man, upon discharge, will be protected for a period of 90 days in order to permit him to readjust to civilian life and determine the sort of insurance protection he wishes to obtain from commercial sources.

Beneficiaries are limited to the immediate family of the serviceman and the indemnity is payable only in monthly installments of $92.90 over a 10-year period.

Veterans having World I or World War II insurance may maintain such insurance if they are recalled to active duty or they may avail themselves of the gratuitous indemnity. For those having permanent type of insurance, provision is made that they may surrender the policies for cash and reinstate them at some future date with a net saving to the individual.

The gratuity is exempt from the claims of creditors and from taxation.

Bars future entrants under the national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance, but any man having either of these policies may reinstate them if lapsed in the same manner as may be done today. Of course, such policies may be continued at the option of the insured.

Any man unable to obtain commercial insurance after discharge at standard rates will be eligible to carry a national service life insurance policy similar to the type of policy issued today for the same sort of condition.

Mr. EVINS. May I say that there is a provision in this bill which provides for a special class of beneficiaries, namely, illegitimate children. I wonder if the Congress wants to go on record as favoring the payment of $10,000 beneficiary payment to illegitimate children? One of the purposes of the act is to bring about economy in the administration of the veterans' insurance program. The investigation of the claims of illegitimate children beneficiaries may not result in economies in administration of the act. I just wish to call this fact to the attention of the House. I shall not object to the passage of the bill. I favor its passage but believe the illegitimate child class of beneficiary should be stricken from the provisions of the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. In reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, who voted to report this bill out of committee, may I say that the question he raises about illegitimate children is where a man recognizes the child and includes it in his insurance. We must give him that right under this bill, as is done in all veterans' insurance legislation.

Mr. Speaker, this bill was carefully considered. I regret very much that the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NOLAND], chairman of the subcommittee, is not present. That committee did a splendid job.

The bill provides for a gratuitous indemnity in the amount of $10,000 to the survivors of all men killed in the armed services on and after June 27, 1950, without cost to the serviceman. I may say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD], who has been inquiring about those Pennsylvania servicemen who were killed by accident in a train wreck in Ohio, that they were in the national service and are covered by this bill.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the men covered under this bill will be protected for a period of 90 days after they leave the service in order to permit them to readjust to civilian life and to determine the sort of insurance protection they wish to obtain from commercial sources. Beneficiaries are limited to the immediate families of the servicemen and the indemnity is payable only in monthly installments of $92.90 over a period of 10 years. This will take care of these families for 10 years.

Veterans having World War I or World War II insurance may maintain such insurance if they are recalled to active duty, or they may avail themselves of the gratuitous indemnity. For the ones having a permanent type of insurance, provision is made that they may surrender the policies for cash and reinstate them at some future date with a net saving to the individual. The gratuity is exempt from the claims of creditors and from taxation.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLOOD. I just wish to observe in connection with the comments of the gentleman from Mississippi that his reference to a certain train wreck will recall to the House the accident when the One Hundred and Ninth Field Artillery of the Twenty-eighth Division of the Pennsylvania National Guard was called into Federal service. They were leaving for Camp Atterbury, Ind. The train wreck, you will recall, took place September 11, 1950. It was right after the men went into the Federal service. I think this part of the bill and the intent and the purpose of this act, especially this retroactive provision, cannot better be illustrated because these boys did not have a chance even to file their applications before they were processed into the Federal service. On their way to camp, with no opportunity of getting insurance, these men were killed as much in action as though they were in Korea. I commend the committee for its action.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill bars future entrants to national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance, but any man having either of these policies may reinstate them in the same manner as may be done today. Of course, such policies may continue at the option of the insured. Any person unable to obtain commercial insurance after discharge at standard rates will be eligible to carry a national service life-insurance policy similar to the type of policy issued today for the same sort of condition.

The Bureau of the Budget has indicated that it favors the approach embodied in this bill and gives as its opinion that had it been in effect several hundreds of millions of dollars would have been saved during the period 1940-49. The Comptroller General estimates that the saving would have amounted to $587,000,000.

The bill, in brief, provides uniform coverage for all members of the Armed Forces from the time they are inducted into active service and 90 days after they are discharged without cost and drastically reduces the administration required to handle such a program.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. EVINS. The members of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs recognize that there is a great deal of merit and benefit in this legislation. However, there are certain amendments that might well be adopted to improve the legislation, and I want to ask the chairman whether or not there is any possibility for amendments to be offered on this bill in the Senate?

Mr. RANKIN. The Senate has a right to amend it.

Mr. EVINS. There will therefore be a possibility then for clarifying amendments as to classes of beneficiaries to be adopted in the Senate.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the lady from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The members of the committee are very anxious to have the provisions of this bill passed. I was talking to the veterans yesterday. They are extremely anxious to have it passed, both the disabled and the nondisabled veterans. There are so many mistakes made at times in the filing for insurance that the men do not get their applications accepted. It will cost the Government less. The veterans' organizations are very anxious to have it passed. Some would like to add other provisions, but they want this bill passed, and passed immediately. If you were in a hospital with arms and legs off or broken backs and had no insurance, you would realize what this will mean. It will cost the Government much less than if they took out the other kind of insurance.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. FORD. Does this bill coincide more or less with the recommendations of the Hardy committee?

Mr. RANKIN. I think so.

Mr. FORD. In effect it is a substitute for the so-called national service life insurance program that we have had in effect during World War II?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I want to be sure that I understand the bill. As I understand, this bill will give automatic life insurance to every boy in the service without the payment of the premium and up to 90 days after discharge. If after the 90 days he wishes to pay for it, he can do so, and carry it just as the boys are now doing.

Mr. RANKIN. If he has had national service life insurance in the past, he can reinstate it, or if he is disabled, he will be permitted to take out Government insurance.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. In fact, he had automatic insurance then, and that protects him for 90 days, and that will not preclude him from getting the $10,000 national life insurance, even though he is disabled.

Mr. RANKIN. If he is disabled to the extent that his disability makes him uninsurable at standard commercial rates.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HARDY. First of all, I want to compliment the Committee on Veterans' Affairs for this very constructive piece of legislation. But, there are a few questions I want to get specific answers on in order that the record will be perfectly clear. Will National Guardsmen and others who participate in active duty 2 weeks of the year be covered?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. During the period of their active service?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Will aviation pilots who fly for only a few hours a month or week be covered during the period of their assignment of duty?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Will aviation cadets be covered?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Now, that is not too clear, as I understand this bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; they are covered.

Mr. HARDY. Aviation cadets under the aviation cadet program then will be covered?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Now then, there is only one settlement provided in this thing.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. There is no lump-sum provision; simply a $10,000 annuity proposition.

Mr. RANKIN. That is correct.

Mr. HARDY. And the annuity is computed at the rate of 2¼ percent?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. This program does not superimpose a gratuitous program now on the national life insurance program.

Mr. RANKIN. It does not.

Mr. HARDY. It does not carry any subsidies other than a straight gratuitous life insurance program.

Mr. RANKIN. That is correct.

Mr. HARDY. It provides an option, does it not, for the military personnel who now have national service life insurance either to continue that insurance or drop it and take the gratuitous program?

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HARDY. They cannot do both?

Mr. RANKIN. They cannot do both; that is right.

Mr. HARDY. Can the gentleman tell us approximately how many Federal employees can be eliminated under this program and how long it will take to eliminate them?

Mr. RANKIN. I cannot tell the gentleman how many, but the recently opened special office in Philadelphia might be closed when this bill is enacted. The Comptroller General tells us that if we had had this law in force from 1940 to 1949 the Government would have saved $587,000,000.

Mr. HARDY. I thank the gentleman. However, I think that is a very conservative figure. I think it would have been considerably more than that.

Mr. RANKIN. I do, too.

Mr. HARDY. At the moment the military forces all have a considerable number of personnel assigned to the responsibility of assisting service people to take out insurance under the national service life insurance program. They will no longer be necessary under this program?

Mr. RANKIN. No.

Mr. HARDY. Those people will be freed for combat and other duties?

Mr. RANKIN. That is right.

Mr. HARDY. I thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I think the gentleman is to be complimented on bringing this measure before the House. He will recall that many of us tried to do this same thing in the spring of 1942. I am certainly very much pleased to see this measure now brought before the House, before this war becomes an all-out war.

Mr. RANKIN. If we had succeeded at that time, the Government would have saved $587,000,000, at least.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. The gentleman is absolutely correct.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. On the question of the reinstatement of insurance or getting insurance if one has been injured in the service, is that retroactive? I have a case where a boy who was injured in the service in World War II is now in the Army again, and they are blocking his getting the insurance because they say one has to wait 10 years if he has had a mental difficulty or disorder. It is an outrageous situation.

Mr. RANKIN. He can take the gratuitous insurance, but if he cannot get the commercial insurance at standard rates, when he gets out, he can take national service life insurance in the manner provided in section 10 of this bill.

Mr. JAVITS. So the insurance provision is retroactive under this bill?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. EVINS. The gentleman would have no objection to the elimination of the illegitimate child provision in the Senate?

Mr. RANKIN. If I had that much influence in the other body, you just do not know the changes I would bring about over there.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

PART I—SERVICEMEN'S INDEMNITY

SECTION 1. This part may be cited as the "Servicemen's Indemnity Act of 1950."

SEC. 2. Except as hereinafter provided, on and after June 27, 1950, any person in the active service of the Army, Navy, Air Force, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard, including the Reserve components thereof while in active duty; cadets and midshipmen at the United States Military, Naval, and Coast Guard Academies; commissioned officers of the Public Health Service while entitled to full military benefits as provided in section 212 (a) of the act of July 1, 1944 (58 Stat. 689), as amended (42 U. S. C. 213); and commissioned officers of the Coast and Geodetic Survey while assigned to duty during a period of war or an emergency as proclaimed by the President or the Congress on projects for the Army, Navy, or Air Force in areas outside the continental United States or in Alaska or in coastal areas of the United States determined by the Department of Defense to be of immediate military hazard, shall be automatically insured by the United States, without cost to such person, against death in active service in the principal amount of $10,000: Provided, That any person called to extended active duty for a period exceeding 30 days shall continue to be so protected for a period of 90 days after separation from such service.

SEC. 3. Upon certification by the Secretary of the service department concerned of the fact of death of any person deemed to have been automatically insured under this part, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall cause the indemnity to be paid as provided in section 4 only to the surviving spouse, child or children (including a stepchild, adopted child, or an illegitimate child if the latter was designated as beneficiary by the insured), parent (including a stepparent, parent by adoption, or person who stood in loco parentis to the insured), brother, or sister of the insured. The insured shall have the right to designate the beneficiary or beneficiaries of the indemnity within the classes herein provided; to designate the proportion of the principal amount to be paid to each; and to change the beneficiary or beneficiaries without the consent thereof but only within the classes herein provided. If the designated beneficiary or beneficiaries do not survive the insured, or if none has been designated, the Administrator shall make payment of the indemnity to the first eligible class of beneficiaries according to the order set forth above, and in equal shares if the class is composed of more than one person.

Any installments not paid to a beneficiary during such beneficiary's lifetime shall be paid to the named contingent beneficiary, if any; otherwise, to the beneficiary or beneficiaries within the permitted class next entitled to priority.

SEC. 4. The indemnity shall be payable in equal monthly installments of 120 in number with interest at the rate of 2¼ percent per annum.

SEC. 5. The automatic indemnity coverage authorized by section 2 shall apply to any person in the active service of the named Armed Forces who, upon death in such active service, is insured against such death under a contract of national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance, but only with respect to a principal amount of indemnity equal to the difference between the amount of insurance in force at the time of death and $10,000: Provided, That any person in active service, who is insured under a permanent plan of national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance, may elect to surrender such contract for its cash value. In any such case, the person may, after separation from active service be granted permanent plan insurance not in excess of the amount surrendered for cash, or may reinstate such surrendered insurance upon payment of the required reserve and the premium for the current month upon application in writing, payment of premiums and evidence satisfactory to the Administrator showing such person to be in good health at the time of such application.

SEC. 6. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is authorized to promulgate such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this part, as are necessary or appropriate to carry out its purposes.

SEC. 7. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this part, to be known as the servicemen's indemnity appropriation, for the payment of liabilities under this part.

SEC. 8. Any person guilty of mutiny, treason, spying, or desertion, or who, because of conscientious objections, refuses to perform services in the land or naval forces of the United States or refuses to wear the uniform of such force, shall forfeit all rights to an indemnity under this act. No indemnity shall be payable for death inflicted as a lawful punishment for crime or for military or naval offense, except when inflicted by an enemy of the United States.

SEC. 9. The provisions of Public Law No. 262, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved August 12, 1935 (49 Stat. 607), and titles II and III of Public Law No. 844, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved June 29, 1936 (49 Stat. 2031), insofar as they are applicable, shall apply to the provisions of this part: Provided, That assignments of all or any part of the beneficiary's interest may be made by a beneficiary to a widow, widower, child, father, mother, brother, or sister of the insured, when all other persons within the permitted classes join in the assignment.

PART II—RESTRICTIONS ON ISSUANCE OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT LIFE INSURANCE AND NATIONAL SERVICE LIFE INSURANCE

SEC. 10. The National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, is hereby amended by adding the following new sections:

"SEC. 619. On and after the date of enactment of the Insurance Act of 1950, and except as otherwise provided in section 5 of the Servicemen's Indemnity Act of 1950 and section 620 hereof, no national service life insurance shall be granted to any person under the provisions of the National Service Life Insurance Act of 1940, as amended, or the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, nor shall any Government life insurance or national service life insurance, on which the United States is authorized by law to pay the premium, be issued or granted to any person under any provision of law: Provided, That the foregoing shall not be construed to prohibit (1) the granting or issuing of national service life insurance or United States Government life insurance in cases in which acceptable applications accompanied by proper and valid remittances or authorizations for the payment of premiums have, prior to the date of approval of the Insurance Act of 1950, been received by the Veterans' Administration, or which have, prior to said date, been placed in the mails properly directed to the Veterans' Administration, or been delivered to an authorized representative of any of the uniformed services.

"SEC. 620. Any person who is released from active service under other than dishonorable conditions on or after the date of enactment of the Insurance Act of 1950, and at the time of release is found by the Administrator to be suffering from a disability or disabilities resulting from or aggravated by such active service which renders such person uninsurable at standard rates, according to recognized underwriting requirements of nongovernmental insurers, shall, upon application in writing made within 1 year from the date of release from active service or within 1 year from date of determination of such a service-connected disability and payment of premiums as provided in this act, be granted insurance by the United States against the death of such person occurring while such insurance is in force. Insurance granted under the provisions of this section shall be on a nonparticipating basis and all premiums and other collections therefor shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury to the credit of a revolving fund and any payments on such insurance shall be made directly from such appropriations to such fund as are hereby authorized. Except as herein provided, the other provisions of this act shall be for application to such insurance."

SEC. 11. This part may be cited as the "Insurance Act of 1950."

With the following committee amendments.

Page 1, line 9, strike out "duty" and insert "service."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIS] be permitted to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the previous remarks of the chairman of the Veterans' Affairs Committee, the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, including his constructive statement and his answers to the questions propounded by the gentleman from Virginia, the chairman of the Hardy subcommittee, which made a previous study of this question of indemnity or insurance for servicemen, have given adequate explanation of the terms of this proposal.

As a member of the subcommittee which held hearings on this important matter, I want to add my voice of approval to the product which we labored and brought forth. This bill is the result of many weeks of investigation and serious thought by members of the staff of the Veterans' Affairs Committee and the subcommittee of which our departing colleague the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NOLAND] served as chairman. In addition to our individual and committee work, we had the benefit of testimony from veterans' organizations, several Government agencies, and a number of private insurance experts. Then, too, we had the benefit of the capable work of the Hardy subcommittee of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. This painstaking work, plus the patience and industry of our subcommittee, which in addition to our chairman, Mr. NOLAND, included Mr. MACK of Illinois; Mr. ELLIOTT, of Alabama; Mr. BATES of Massachusetts; and your humble servant, are responsible for the sound and well-considered measure which is now before the House for action.

Many problems have associated themselves with the present system of premium-paying national service life insurance. Among them are lack of uniform coverage, unreasonable administrative difficulties, high administrative cost, and continuation of Government participation in veterans' insurance in peacetime, long after the period of risk caused by participation in the armed services has passed.

In spite of strenuous efforts by officials in the armed services, there were a substantial number of World War II servicemen who carried no Government insurance at all, or had an inadequate amount. A substantial number of insurance records were lost. Thus, in addition to the inadequacy of coverage, the intent of an appreciable amount of national service life insurance was not fulfilled.

The bill before us today substitutes the principle of indemnity for a system of premium-paying insurance. All servicemen, while on active duty and for a reasonable period thereafter, will be covered in the amount of $10,000.

On the basis of all the information we have been able to gather, the net cost to the taxpayers, would be less than the cost of continuing the present premium type national service life insurance. Thus, uniform and universal coverage would be cheaper, without cost to the servicemen, than the present rather involved, administratively top-heavy, premium paying type of insurance. The saving through elimination of red tape and Government bookkeeping would be substantial, and accounts for the net lowering of cost to the American taxpayers. It is a matter of record that the Assistant Administrator for Insurance stated that the administrative burden of national service life insurance, if it were to be expanded to cover the veterans of a possible third war, would be unbearable. This fact adds to the urgency of the legislation before us today.

The coverage of this bill would be retroactive to the date of the military action in Korea, that is, June 27, 1950. By substituting this indemnity program for the present national service life insurance, the latter system would gradually expire. Because of the contractual nature of existing NSLI policies, those in effect must be permitted to continue. However, no new policies would be issued—understanding of course that the present right of reinstatement by NSLI policy holders would not be interfered with. Any NSLI policy holder who has converted his policy to a permanent plan, would be permitted to surrender his policy for cash at the time his gratuitous type indemnity became effective; that is, when he entered the service; then would be permitted to reinstate such surrendered insurance after the gratuitous indemnity plan no longer was available to him.

Part II of the bill provides the only exception to the afore-mentioned statement that no new national service life insurance policies would be issued. If, as a result of service, a veteran could not obtain insurance from private companies at standard rates, he would be permitted to obtain nonparticipating national service life insurance from the Government. This continues the so-called H insurance which is now in effect as a part of the national service life insurance program.

As I see it, Mr. Speaker, this bill would provide better indemnity coverage for the men in our armed services, and at the same time it would get the Government out of the business of providing peacetime insurance.

Better coverage, at less cost, with less red tape—these are the major benefits of the bill before us. This is sound legislation to deal with a problem of considerable urgency.

Mr. EVINS. Mr. Speaker, I am strongly in favor of the enactment of this legislation but feel that one particular phase of the legislation or section of the bill should be called to the attention of the House. It is that section relating to classes of beneficiaries under the terms of the national service life insurance policy. Among the special classes and categories of beneficiaries is included illegitimate children of veterans and I feel that this class of beneficiary should be stricken from the legislation. One of the principal purposes of the bill in addition to providing $10,000 gratuitous insurance to men entering on active military service is to bring about economies in the administration of the act and the operation of the veterans' insurance program.

In the event the illegitimate-child category is continued in the bill and enacted into law, I fear that there will be a tremendous increase in administrative costs. I can envision investigators of the Veterans' Administration going all over the world investigating claims of this character. Letters and affidavits might well be submitted to the Veterans' Administration in support of the claim of a particular beneficiary. We should eliminate the illegitimate-child category and thus insure that the legitimate children, brothers and sisters, fathers and mothers, and relatives be made the beneficiary under the terms of this gratuitous insurance. I feel very strongly that this provision should be deleted from the legislation but under the unanimous-consent request an amendment to this effect cannot be offered at this time.

The matter is called to the attention of the House and made a matter of record with the hope that action can be taken in the other body or in conference if such develops.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks in the RECORD on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

STUDY OF THE HEALTH OF WORLD WAR II PRISONERS OF WAR

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 8848) to provide for a study of the mental and physical sequelae of malnutrition and starvation suffered by prisoners of war and civilian internees during World War II.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the War Claims Commission, with the assistance and cooperation of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, shall inquire into and report to the Congress with respect to the mortality rate and the mental and physical sequelae of malnutrition and imprisonment sustained by members of the Armed Forces of the United States and civilian American citizens who were imprisoned by enemies of the United States during World War II. To this end the War Claims Commission is authorized and directed to make all necessary arrangements (including contacts, agreements, and so forth), for the conduct of research activities for the purpose of determining—

(1) The procedures and standards to be applied in the diagnosis of the mental and physical condition of former prisoners of war;

(2) The life expectancy of former prisoners of war;

(3) Whether there is evidence to sustain a conclusive presumption of service connection in favor of former prisoners of war for purposes of hospitalization in Veterans' Administration facilities; and

(4) Standards to be applied, for the evaluation of claims of American civilian and military personnel based upon the physical and mental sequelae of the conditions of their imprisonment, in the event such claims are later made compensable.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I demand a second, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, there was no objection to this bill in committee. I am sure there will be none in the House. This bill, as I said a while ago, provides for a study of the health of prisoners of war of World War II to be coordinated by the War Claims Commission. That should have been done long ago. Some of our war prisoners have been overlooked. They were given the most brutal treatment in all the history of civilization. Actually, as I said, the medical research would be done by the Veterans' Administration, the Public Health Service, the Surgeon General of the Armed Forces, and possibly private agencies, in an effort to determine the result of malnutrition and starvation upon these men; and how it affects their later life. I can see no reason why anybody would object to that kind of legislation.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. My sole purpose in objecting at this time is the fact that it seems to me we are in the closing days of the session here. I doubt whether there is a quorum of the House in Washington. I cannot see why this particular measure could not go over for due consideration when the full Congress is here in January or February.

Mr. RANKIN. Let me say to the gentleman from Minnesota that we appointed a subcommittee who carefully went into the subject. They made a careful study of the proposition. The bill has been reported out. If we were to carry this over until the next session, we would probably have to go through all that procedure again. Those who heard the testimony were unanimously in favor of this bill. All of the service organizations were for it. The amount of money required is very small compared to what we have been spending elsewhere.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Does the gentleman assure me that it has received thorough discussion at the hands of the subcommittee and of the committee?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; indeed.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I would have no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this bill, H. R. 9911, providing for a gratuitous indemnity for servicemen is the result of months of study and consideration by the staff of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs and by a special subcommittee composed of five members of the committee.

Prior to public hearings held by the subcommittee, the staff met a number of times with representatives from the Army, the Navy, the Coast Guard, Public Health Service, the Veterans' Administration, the Bureau of the Budget, the General Accounting Office, and all of the major veterans' organizations. At these conferences each phase of the insurance problem was weighed pro and con, and finally a bill was drawn up and the subcommittee then received testimony upon it from all of the interested organizations.

The bill under consideration today was reported from the Committee on Veterans' Affairs without a dissenting vote. It authorizes the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service. The pertinent features of the measure are as follows:

On and after June 27, 1950, each person in the Armed Forces is insured against death in the amount of $10,000 without cost to the person. For your information, this would cover in those National Guard men who died in the tragic train wreck, as well as those who died later in the airplane disaster.

Protection covers the period from induction into active service and for 90 days after separation from service. This 90 days was deemed sufficient for a man to return to his home and obtain insurance, if he desired it, from commercial insurance companies. If the person is injured in service to such an extent as to make him uninsurable at normal commercial rates, then he may obtain a policy under the National Service Life Insurance Act. I am informed that all a veteran would have to do in such a case would be to submit evidence to the Administrator of Veteran's Affairs that a commercial insurance company had refused to insure him at normal commercial rates, and he would then be allowed to insure with the Government.

The measure bars future entrants to United States Government life insurance and the national service life insurance programs, after enactment of this act. But any person having one of these policies may continue it in force or if he has a lapsed policy he may reinstate it upon a showing of good health.

Beneficiaries are limited to the surviving spouse, child, or children, parent, brother, or sister of the insured. The indemnity cannot be assigned for the benefit of creditors and it is exempt from taxation. The indemnity is paid in monthly installments of $92.90 each over a 10-year period.

The Bureau of the Budget has reported that it believes enactment of the bill at this time would be desirable and that it is consistent with a sound long-range program for servicemen's and veterans' benefits. The Comptroller General has estimated that had this program been in effect during the period 1940–49, the cost to the Government would have been reduced by approximately $587,000,000.

As I see it, there are two very good reasons for the enactment of the measure. First, it promises to effect a great saving in the cost of administering our insurance program. It would mean a great reduction in the number of personnel necessary to carry out the program. In this connection, it is interesting to quote the statement of Mr. Harold W. Breining, the Assistant Administrator for Insurance, of the Veterans' Administration. Testifying before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, this year, he said:

> In time of emergency I think the manpower to operate an insurance system, projecting in the future, would probably not be available. * * * I base that on the difficulties that we had in connection with the operation of the insurance program during the last war. Most of our difficulties, even carrying over up to today, were due to lack of personnel, space, and equipment. * * * It is likely to be worse and I do not think we ought to repeat the experience that we had in this last war.

Secondly, the bill covers every man who enters the Armed Forces and it covers him or her equally. All of us have had distressing experiences with those cases where men were killed without insurance or with too little insurance. That would not happen under this measure.

This bill is supported by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Disabled American Veterans, and the AMVETS. The American Legion has taken no stand upon the question because of a lack of mandate from their national convention. The National Association of Life Underwriters, representing the insurance agents, strongly recommends this approach to the problem, while the commercial insurance companies believe, as a whole, that this approach would be advantageous to the serviceman and to the country.

It is not a perfect bill, and I doubt that we can ever enact a measure that would be perfect, but it is, in my opinion, the proper approach to a problem that we must solve. I believe that we should enact this measure, and then, if there are objectionable features to it, we can pass remedial legislation in the new Congress. We have a duty now to protect those men who are fighting and dying for us in Korea and elsewhere. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. Speaker, it is extremely important that the bill be passed now. If it goes over to the next session of the Congress, no one knows when it would come up. The Committee on Veterans' Affairs will have new members. It will mean new hearings. In the House most of our time probably will be taken up in passing legislation for the conduct of the war. We discussed the plight of the prisoners many times in past years in the Committee on Veterans' Affairs. This bill was unanimously reported. It has the unanimous support of all the veterans' organizations. It is my belief that the study of the effects of the prisoners of war in the Korean conflict should be added to this bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCMILLAN].

EXTENDING PROVISIONS OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA EMERGENCY RENT ACT

Mr. MCMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I call up the Senate Joint Resolution (S. J. Res. 209) to amend and extend the provisions of the District of Columbia Emergency Rent Act, as amended, and ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 1 (b) of the District of Columbia Emergency Rent Act, as amended (D. C. Code, 1940 ed., sec. 45–1601 (b)), is hereby amended by striking out "January 31, 1951" and inserting in lieu thereof "March 31, 1951."

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. MCMILLAN of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. HARRIS] to call up the next bill.

PROVIDING FOR SUPPORT AND MAINTENANCE OF CHILDREN BORN OUT OF WEDLOCK

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1122) relating to children born out of wedlock, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to provide for the support and maintenance of bastards in the District of Columbia", approved June 18, 1912 (37 Stat. 134), as amended February 22, 1921 (41 Stat. 1144), and March 16, 1926 (44 Stat. 208), be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. Title: This act may be cited as "An act relating to children born out of wedlock."

SEC. 3. Jurisdiction: The juvenile court of the District of Columbia is hereby given jurisdiction of all cases arising under this act. Proceedings shall be instituted in the name of the District of Columbia and prosecution upon information shall be by the Corporation Counsel for the District of Columbia or any of his assistants.

SEC. 4. Time of bringing complaint: Proceedings to establish paternity and provide for the support of a child born out of wedlock may be instituted after four months of pregnancy or within two years after the birth of the child, or within one year after the putative father has ceased making contributions for the support of such child: Provided, however, That the time during which the defendant shall be absent from the jurisdiction shall be excluded from the computation of the time within which complaint may be filed.

SEC. 5. Complaint: Any unmarried woman who is at least 4 months pregnant or who has been delivered of a child born out of wedlock, or any married woman who is at least 4 months pregnant with a child, which if born alive, may be born out of wedlock, or who has been delivered of a child born out of wedlock and who was not living with nor cohabiting with her husband during the period of time in which such child could have been conceived, may go before an Assistant Corporation Counsel for the District of Columbia at the juvenile court and accuse any man of being the father of her child and request his arrest. In case of death, disability, or incompetence of the mother, the complaint may be made by the custodian, guardian, or next friend of the child. The complainant shall be examined under oath by an Assistant Corporation Counsel concerning the married or single status of the mother when the child was begotten, when and where it was born, if born, and such other information as may be deemed necessary or pertinent for testing the truth of the accusation. If, upon examination, there appears reasonable cause to believe that the woman is at least 4 months pregnant or that the child, if born, is within the age limits provided in this act, or that the putative father has ceased making contribution for the support of such child within 1 year from the time of making complaint, and reasonable cause to believe that the accused person is the father thereof, the complaint shall be reduced to writing by such officer, verified by the complainant, and filed with the clerk of the court; and such verified complaint may be introduced in evidence to impeach the complaining witness in any subsequent proceedings therein.

SEC. 6. Apprehension of accused: Upon the filing of the complaint, the case shall be calendared forthwith for preliminary hearing. The clerk of the court shall issue a summons requiring the accused to appear in court on a day certain for such purpose, or, if deemed necessary a warrant for the arrest of the defendant shall be issued, directed to the United States marshal or the Major and Superintendent or any member of the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia, requiring the accused to be arrested and brought before the court.

SEC. 7. Bond; commitment on failure to give bond; jury trial: The court may require the accused to enter into bond with surety in a sum not to exceed $2,500, guaranteeing his appearance on the date set for hearing or trial. If the defendant shall fail to appear, the security for his appearance shall be forfeited and shall be applied toward the support of the child if so ordered by the court. If the defendant shall fail to post bond fixed by the court he shall forthwith be committed to the Washington Asylum and Jail, there to remain until the date set for hearing, or until he enter into the required bond or otherwise be discharged by due process of law. In all prosecutions under this act the defendant shall be entitled to, but may waive, trial by jury. In no event, however, shall final hearing take place until after the birth of the child.

SEC. 8. Blood tests: Whenever it is relevant to the prosecution or defense of an illegitimacy action, the court may, in its discretion, direct that the mother, child, and the defendant submit to one or more blood tests to determine whether or not the defendant can be excluded as being the father of the child, but the results of the test shall be admissible as evidence only in cases where defendant does not object to its admissibility.

SEC. 9. Exclusion of public: Upon trial of proceedings under this act, the court shall exclude the general public, at the request of either party.

SEC. 10. (a) Judgment: prenatal and confinement expenses; maintenance: If the defendant, in open court, shall acknowledge the paternity of a child born out of wedlock, or if at the trial the finding of the court or jury be against the defendant, the court in rendering judgment thereon may enter an order for the payment of the prenatal medical care and costs of the mother's confinement and expenses of childbirth in such amount or amounts as it may deem reasonable, commensurate with defendant's ability to pay. The court shall also order the payment of annual amounts, equal or varying, for the maintenance and education of the child, commensurate with defendant's ability to pay, such payments to be made at such periods or intervals as the court directs. The court, in its discretion, may order payments to be made by the defendant at the precinct wherein he resides through the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia. Payments shall continue until the child reaches the age of 16 years unless the child prior thereto be legally adopted.

(b) Petition for modification of judgment; hearing: The court may from time to time, upon petition of any party in interest, change or modify its order directing the amount that defendant shall pay for the maintenance and support of the child. Hearing on such petition shall be held not less than 10 days following notice in writing by the clerk of the court to the parties in interest, mailed to or left at their last known places of residence.

(c) Death of child: In case of the death of the child before reaching the age of 16 years, the court, upon proof thereof, may order the payment of reasonable funeral expenses, and shall terminate the order for maintenance; and any arrears which may be owing at the time of death may, in the discretion of the court, be canceled.

SEC. 11. (a) Performance bond; commitment; probation: The court may require the defendant to give security not to exceed $2,500 guaranteeing payments ordered by the court. The court may, however, in its discretion, suspend the requirement of security and place the defendant on probation to the court on condition that payments be made as ordered. In default of payments as ordered, the court may commit the defendant to jail for a period of not more than 1 year. At the expiration of the term of commitment the defendant may be discharged, but his liability to make subsequent payments or any payments in arrears in accordance with the judgment shall not thereby be affected. In lieu of commitment or as a condition of his release from jail, the court may suspend sentence and place the defendant on probation upon such terms as the court may direct. The amount of security, if forfeited, shall be disbursed as the court in its direction may direct.

(b) Judgment: execution: In event of default of payments as ordered, the court may, in its discretion, after notice by registered mail to the defendant at his last-known address, and after hearing, reduce the amount of arrears to judgment. The juvenile court of the District of Columbia is hereby empowered after such notice and hearing to reduce to judgment the arrears under any order hereafter entered for the support and maintenance of a child born out of wedlock or for any amounts provided to be paid by the defendant under any section or sections of this act, and when docketed in the clerk's office of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia such judgment shall have the same force and effect as judgments of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia, and execution thereon may be effected in the same manner as upon judgments of the said district court.

SEC. 12. Voluntary acknowledgment of paternity by father: The putative father of a child born out of wedlock may enter into an agreement with the mother of the child, or with some other person on behalf of the child, for the support and maintenance of said child, and said agreement may be submitted at any time to the court for ratification and approval. When said agreement is ratified and approved, the court shall issue an order incorporating the terms thereof, the payments thereunder may be received and disbursed by the court in the same manner as provided in section 13 of this act. The faithful performance under the terms of said agreement shall bar other remedies of the mother or any other person on behalf of the child for the support of the child, subject to the provisions of section 10 (b) of this act.

SEC. 13. (a) Concurrent jurisdiction in nonsupport cases: The juvenile court of the District of Columbia is hereby given concurrent jurisdiction with the United States District Court for the District of Columbia in all cases arising under the act of Congress of March 23, 1906 (34 Stat. 86), as amended June 18, 1912 (37 Stat. 136), and June 10, 1926 (44 Stat. 716) (title 22, sec. 903, of the D. C. Code, 1940 ed.), and the court, in its discretion, may order payments to be made by the defendant at the precinct wherein he resides, through the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia.

(b) Failure to support illegitimate child; misdemeanor: The provisions of the said act of Congress of March 23, 1906 (34 Stat. 86), as amended, making it a misdemeanor to abandon or willfully neglect to provide for the support and maintenance of minor children in destitute or necessitous circumstances, shall also apply to any person who abandons or fails to support his illegitimate child when paternity has been established judicially or when paternity has been directly acknowledged by the putative father under oath, or indirectly acknowledged by voluntarily making contributions to the support of such child.

(c) Voluntary contributions for support: The juvenile court of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized to approve voluntary agreements for the support and maintenance of wife or minor children and to accept payments made pursuant thereto and disburse the same to the person or persons for whom such contributions are paid, in the same manner as payments are accepted and disbursed under the provisions of the act of Congress of March 23, 1906 (34 Stat. 86), as amended.

SEC. 14. Liability of the father's estate: In the event of the death of the defendant after paternity has been established and prior to the time the child reaches the age of 16 years, any sum or sums due and unpaid under any order of the court at the time of defendant's death shall be a valid claim against the defendant's estate.

SEC. 15. New birth record upon marriage of natural parents: Whenever a certified copy of a marriage certificate is submitted to the Health Officer of the District of Columbia establishing that the previously unwed parents of an illegitimate child have intermarried subsequent to the brith of said child and paternity of the child has been judicially determined or acknowledged by the husband before the Health Officer of the District of Columbia, a new certificate of birth, bearing the original date of birth and the names of both parents, shall be issued and substituted for the certificate of birth then on file. The original certificate of birth and all papers pertaining to the issuance of the new certificate shall be placed under seal, and opened for inspection only upon order of the United States District Court for the District of Columbia.

SEC. 16. (a) Reports to Bureau of Vital Statistics: Upon entry of a final judgment determining the paternity of a child born out of wedlock, the clerk of the court shall forward a certificate to the bureau of vital statistics of the jurisdiction in which the child was born, giving the name of the person adjudged to be the father of said child.

(b) Upon receipt of the certificate as provided in section 16 (a) hereof, the Health Officer of the District of Columbia shall file said certificate with the original birth record, and thereafter may issue a certificate of birth registration including thereon the name of the person adjudged to be the father of said child.

SEC. 17. Records: None of the records or proceedings in any case arising under this act shall be open to inspection by anyone other than defendant or counsel of record except upon order of the court. The court upon proper showing may, in its discretion, authorize the clerk to furnish certified copies of any such records or portions thereof to the defendant, the mother, or custodian of the child, any party in interest, or their duly authorized attorneys, and the clerk is hereby authorized to furnish certified copies of such records or portions thereof upon request to the United States attorney for the District of Columbia for use as evidence in nonsupport proceedings as provided in section 13 of this act.

SEC. 18. Construction of statute; appropriations: This act shall be so interpreted as to effectuate the protection and welfare of the child involved in any proceedings hereunder, and appropriations to carry out the purposes of this act are hereby authorized.

SEC. 19. Constitutionality: If any section, subdivision, or clause of this act shall be held to be unconstitutional or invalid, such decision shall not affect the validity of the remaining portions of this act.

Page 11, line 16, strike the period following the word "act" and insert a comma and add the following: "and to the Bureau of Vital Statistics as principal in section 16 (a) hereof."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. CHATHAM (at the request of Mr. RICHARDS) was given permission to extend his remarks and include an article on China.

Mr. SMITH of Wisconsin asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. MILLER of California asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. JAVITS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter.

Mr. CANFIELD asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial.

REVIEW OF ORDERS OF FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 5487) to provide for the review of orders of the Federal Communications Commission under the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, and of certain orders of the Secretary of Agriculture made under the Packers and Stockyards Act, 1921, as amended, and the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, and of orders of the United States Maritime Commission or the Federal Maritime Board under the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, and the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, as amended, together with Senate amendments, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 2, line 12, after Board", insert "or the Maritime Administration."

Page 2, line 13, strike out "or Board," and insert "Board, or Administration."

Page 6, strike out all after line 20 over to and including line 3 on page 7.

Page 11, line 10, after "Agriculture", insert "or the United States Maritime Commission, the Federal Maritime Board, and the Maritime Administration."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to provide for the review of orders of the Federal Communications Commission under the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, and of certain orders of the Secretary of Agriculture made under the Packers and Stockyards Act, 1921, as amended, and the Perishable Agricultural Commodities Act, 1930, as amended, and of orders of the United States Maritime Commission or the Federal Maritime Board or the Maritime Administration under the Shipping Act, 1916, as amended, and the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933, as amended."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS]?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

SENATE

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1950

(Legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, amid all the bitterness and ill will of these days, we thank Thee for the gentle, balmy climate of the Christmastide. May the cynicism which has tarnished our faith be dissolved by the confident assurance that these clouds are lies and that the blue sky is the truth.

We would bow anew at the shrine of that One who didst come to a violent world and who is now remembered and adored, while the ruthless dictators are forgotten. In a world that is a neighborhood and must be made a brotherhood or perish, join us to that saving minority that across the boundaries of prejudice, intolerance, and hatred extends the dominion of understanding and good will. In the Redeemer's name we ask it. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. GEORGE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Monday, December 18, 1950, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States submitting nominations was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Miller, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1122) relating to children born out of wedlock, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 3229. An act to amend the Internal Revenue Code, as amended, and the Federal Alcohol Administration Act, as amended;

H. R. 8848. An act to provide for a study of the mental and physical sequelae of malnutrition and starvation suffered by prisoners of war and civilian internees during World War II;

H. R. 9828. An act to authorize relief of authorized certifying officers of terminated war agencies in liquidation by the Department of Labor; and

H. R. 9911. An act to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes.

A resolution adopted by the board of commissioners of the city of Newark, N. J., favoring the enactment of House bill 9710, to assist the large cities of the United States in planning and constructing facilities designed to serve as garage and parking areas in time of peace and as protective shelters in time of atomic war; to the Committee on Armed Services.

A letter in the nature of a petition from the National Council of Jewish Women, Inc., New York, N. Y., signed by Mrs. Irving M. Engel, national president, relating to the confirmation of the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg as Assistant Secretary of Defense, and so forth; ordered to lie on the table.

NOMINATION OF CHARLES E. WILSON TO BE DIRECTOR OF DEFENSE MOBILIZATION—EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

During the colloquy between Mr. FULBRIGHT and Mr. BREWSTER,

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I wish to report the nomination of Charles E. Wilson, from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. We are already acting under a unanimous-consent proceeding. Does the Senator from South Carolina now mean to put that aside?

The VICE PRESIDENT. One would not affect the other, if it is granted.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, as in executive session, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, I ask unanimous consent to report favorably the nomination of Charles E. Wilson, of New York, to be Director of Defense Mobilization.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination will be received, and placed on the Executive Calendar.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I wish to say the nomination was unanimously approved by members of the committee on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report from the committee be placed at the end of the colloquy which is now taking place.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT BY THE VICE PRESIDENT WITH REFERENCE TO YEA-AND-NAY VOTES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to make an observation at this time, while many Senators are present.

For some time there has been growing a custom by which some Senators, when there is a yea-and-nay vote, will come to the desk and will whisper to the clerks how they desire to be recorded when their names are called, and then will depart from the Chamber. Thereafter their names are called, and there is no response, but the clerk complies with the request. That has been done by Senators on both sides of the aisle.

The Chair thinks that not only is it a bad custom, but it is in violation of the Senate rule. The rule requires that when a Senator's name is called during the taking of a yea-and-nay vote, that Senator shall answer either "yea" or "nay," and shall do so publicly.

If one Senator has a right to engage in the practice to which the Chair has just referred, a dozen Senators would have an equal right to do so, or all Senators would have an equal right to do so. Likewise, if Senators have a right to come to the desk, in advance of the calling of their names, and state to the clerk how they wish to be recorded when their names are reached, Senators would have a right to call up on the telephone and instruct the clerks how they wish to be recorded. Obviously that is a violation of the rules, and it adds to the confusion existing at the desk, because in such case the clerk who is calling the yeas and nays cannot very well listen to the responses of Senators whose names are called, and at the same time understand what is being whispered to him by a Senator who wishes to instruct the clerk how his vote should be recorded when his name is called somewhat later on.

In the case of a quorum call, the situation is different; but in the case of a yea-and-nay vote, the Chair thinks it is contemplated by the rule that each Senator shall announce his vote publicly and shall be present when his vote is announced.

For that reason, the Chair will advise the clerks to discontinue the practice, which the Chair thinks is a violation of the rule, of having Senators stop at the desk and advise the clerks how they wish to be recorded when their names are reached later on, during the call of the roll.

The Chair wishes to make that announcement to all Senators, because in the opinion of the Chair the practice is in contravention of the rule relating to yea-and-nay votes.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I heartily agree in every respect with the observations made by the distinguished Vice President. Not only do I think the statement he has made is entirely warranted, but I think the time has come when the procedure he has stated should be followed, under the rule, by all Members of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I thank the Senator from Nebraska.

EXTENSION OF FIRST WAR POWERS ACT, 1941

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to introduce a bill which amends and extends the provisions of the First War Powers Act of 1941. This is an important measure.

I have conferred with the distinguished Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN], who is chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. It is my understanding that the letter which was sent to the Senate yesterday by the President of the United States was referred to that committee, and I assume that this bill will be referred to the same committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has consulted the rules in regard to this matter, and also has consulted the Parliamentarian. The Chair thinks that is the committee to which this bill should be referred. The Chair was first under the impression that the bill might be referred either to the Judiciary Committee or to the Armed Services Committee. However, upon reconsideration it seems that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments obviously has jurisdiction, because the bill provides for certain reorganizations, transfers, and so forth. The previous bills on that subject were referred prior to the enactment of the Reorganization Act, which now governs.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I did not quite understand the nature of the bill. Is it proposed to reenact the War Powers Act of World War II?

Mr. LUCAS. No. Practically the entire purpose of the bill is to amend and extend certain provisions of the First War Powers Act of 1941. For instance, the First War Powers Act contained a phrase "for the prosecution of the war." That phrase is stricken from the bill now being introduced. As I recall, this bill deals only with the successful promotion of the national defense, instead of "the prosecution of the war."

Next, there is the striking out of the words, "the Army and the Navy," at each place where they appear in each section, and the insertion, in lieu thereof, the words, "the Armed Forces." That phrase would include all the integrated forces, including the Army, the Navy, and the Air Corps.

Mr. TAFT. Does the bill give the President the right to reorganize the Government in any way he sees fit to do?

Mr. LUCAS. Yes, and that is the law at the present time, as I understand, under the First War Powers Act.

The only thing that is proposed to be done by the bill in the case of the First War Powers Act, which is still in effect, as I understand, is the striking out of certain provisions which deal with World War II, because we are now dealing with something else, not with World War II.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I wish to make this statement: Of course in World War II we gave the President the power to reorganize the Government. He did that without any consultation with Congress. He submitted no plans to Congress.

Now we have in effect a Reorganization Act, under which the President can make any reorganization he wishes to make, if he submits a plan for it to Congress, and if the plan is not rejected by either House of Congress.

I feel very strongly that this matter is a controversial one. If the President is going to reorganize the Government now, when the Reorganization Act is in effect, I think he should do so in accordance with its provisions.

All I have to say is that it seems to me this Congress is through. I think a matter of this importance should go over until the next Congress. I propose to oppose the enactment of any substantial change of a general nature in the powers of the President of this sort.

If there is a desire to create a particular department in a hurry, let us have the plan submitted, and let us act on it. But it seems to me that there is an effort to rush through a great deal of emergency legislation. There is about to be reported an excess profits tax bill, and if we are to legislate properly, we ought to spend at least 2 weeks more in committee in considering the bill. We are to be asked to consider a civil defense bill, which is being proposed in the House of Representatives, conferring the most extensive powers, which ought to be considered at length by the Senate before the powers are granted. It seems to me that we should not, in this Congress, begin now to enact new legislation of a fundamental nature. I may be mistaken about the nature of the proposal the Senator from Illinois is discussing, but it seems to me that this Congress, a "lame duck" Congress, ought to finish what we set out to do, namely, to pass the appropriation bill and the excess-profits-tax bill, but we ought not to embark upon some great project which is fundamentally new.

The new Congress meets in 2 weeks, and it seems to me we ought to finish our work and refer matters of great importance which do not have to be acted upon tomorrow, at least, to the new Congress.

Mr. LUCAS. Merely by way of a brief reply to the Senator from Ohio, let me say that section 2 of the War Powers Act deals with contracts, and it is proposed to amend section 201 of the act by striking out the words "the prosecution of the war effort" and the words "the prosecution of war," appearing in that section, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "in the national defense."

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, that act has been repealed; it has expired; it is no longer in force.

Mr. LUCAS. It will be in force if this amendment to the first War Powers Act is adopted by the Congress.

With respect to the reorganization features of the bill, that is a matter, I take it, which the committee would very seriously consider, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Ohio; but aside from the statute referred to by the Senator from Ohio, it seems to me that the other matters covered by the bill I am introducing are very important. I undertake to say that time is of the essence, and we cannot afford to lose any more time. This is a short session, and another session is coming on; but it seems to me, as a result of a cursory examination of this bill, which is very simple, in the way of an amendment to the War Powers Act, it is absolutely necessary that immediate action be taken. I sincerely hope, and I know that the able Senator from Arkansas and his committee will cooperate, that immediate action will be taken. If the question of reorganization of the Government is vital, and if it is not desired to take that chance at this time, certainly the other proposals which I have discussed can be reported back.

Mr. McCLELLAN and Mr. TAFT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield first to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I may say to the distinguished majority leader that, within the last few moments, I have conferred with the Director of the Budget and representatives of the executive branch of the Government regarding this measure, and have received a statement of their views with respect to the necessity for it.

I fully agree with the able majority leader that the second aspect of the bill relating to contracts should be enacted immediately. I also agree, in part, with the distinguished Senator from Ohio, with respect to the provisions dealing with reorganizing the executive branch of the Government. We have in the statutes now a Reorganization Act. I am perfectly willing that the President be granted such powers as may be absolutely necessary to bring about the quickest, fullest mobilization of our armed strength, but I do not agree that he should be given unrestricted and unlimited powers to reorganize Government agencies not related to the war effort and whose functions are not related to that effort. There is no necessity for our granting powers to do that. It will be my purpose to call the committee together to hold hearings on this bill tomorrow morning.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator from Arkansas. I think he has made a very fair statement about the entire matter.

I know what the Senator from Ohio has in mind; at least, I heard it on the radio this morning. I think it was a statement made by the Senator from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER]. The Senator from Maine seems to be getting a good deal of publicity in these days, and rightfully so. He is entitled to it at all times.

Mr. BREWSTER. I trust the Senator from Illinois will continue to agree with me as he did yesterday.

Mr. LUCAS. I seldom agree with the Senator from Maine, because he is seldom right. But anyway, I think it was reported over the radio that the Senator from Maine was going to object to this bill because of the reorganization feature dealing with the Welfare Department.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is entirely in error. I intended nothing of the kind, I said nothing of the kind. It must have been some other Senator.

Mr. LUCAS. Very well, some other Senator. I thought the Senator from Maine would be glad to accept that radio comment. Anyway, it was some Senator on the Republican side. I can understand how Senators feels about the reorganization of the welfare department, in view of the previous vote in the Senate, but certainly the Senator from Arkansas will be able to take care of that. What I am contending is that there are certain provisions in this emergency amendment to the War Powers Act which are absolutely vital and essential, to which I believe no one, whether Democrat or Republican, can take exception.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I should like to take two exceptions: First, this is not an amendment to the War Powers Act. There is no War Powers Act. It has expired; it is gone, except a small section dealing with the importation of certain commodities, which is found in the Second War Powers Act. Otherwise, the First War Powers Act is not law. The question is one of enacting a new law, not of amending the old one.

That is my first suggestion. In the second place, I should like to suggest to the Senator that if the President wants to reorganize even the Armed Forces, and if he is ready to do it, if he knows what it is he wants to do, he can write out such a reorganization plan and send it up to the Congress and it can be approved within 24 hours, if we want to do it. It does not seem to me that it is at all necessary to give the President power to take to pieces any reorganization we may have undertaken, even in the war field.

We spent a great deal of time on the Unification Act. I do not know whether this bill would enable the President to change the entire Unification Act, but it seems to me that if he wants to change it, he ought to submit the plan to the Congress under the present Reorganization Act, and give us a chance to pass on the exact plan. I certainly assure the Senator that I am in favor of speed—100-percent speed—if any such proposal is submitted.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator from Ohio is continually talking about the reorganization of the Government under this bill or amendment of the First War Powers Act. Mr. President, I am satisfied the Senator from Ohio has not even taken a cursory glance at this measure and as to what the Executive desires to have done in order that essential work may be carried on speedily and effectively. It is necessary that we give key officials certain powers before they can operate, and particularly under section 201 dealing with contracts. Unless the amendment now proposed is adopted by the Congress, they will be absolutely stymied so far as any immediate action is concerned.

Once the Senator from Ohio realizes exactly what this bill proposes to do, eliminating the question of the reorganization of the Government, I think he will have no objection to its being passed. I sincerely hope that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments will meet and will report the bill as speedily as possible. I thank the Senator from Arkansas for his early attention to it, and for his statement that the committee is expected to consider the bill at once.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I was not in the Chamber when the bill was introduced, but I have been in conversation for the past 2 days with the Department of the Army, because of certain contracts for supplies, which certain people in my own State, entered into a few months ago with the ordnance department. Since that time there has been a rise in the cost of raw materials, to an extent which makes it impossible to perform without the companies going broke. Therefore, I asked whether there could be any relief. I was told that no relief could be given without legislation, but that a bill would be brought before the Senate which would give authority to relieve from these hardship cases, so that such contracts could either be renegotiated in the light of the present costs of raw materials, the rise in costs, or else canceled, or some other adjustment made. My question to the Senator is whether the bill introduced by him today, aims to relieve that kind of hardship situation.

Mr. LUCAS. I think the bill will absolutely relieve it by amendment to section 201, which deals with contracts. As the War Powers Act of 1941 is written at the present time, it deals with the prosecution of the war effort in connection with World War II. It does not deal with the prosecution or promotion of the national defense at this particular time.

So, according to the executive department, they have no authority to proceed to change any contracts or to do anything along the line of promoting the national defense, by way of entering into contracts, until the authority proposed by the bill is granted.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I thank the Senator. I think that is the way the Army felt about it. It is desired that these contractors shall be relieved from a hardship.

Mr. LUCAS. The Attorney General's office has advised the President of the United States that what is proposed by the bill should be and must be done, and no action can be taken until it is done. Consequently, if we delay it until after January 3, it will not be delayed for a few days only, but possibly for a few weeks. I know we are all interested in immediate action, so far as it does not do any violence to the proposition which has been discussed.

With respect to the reorganization feature, that can be taken care of, if the situation is as bad as the Senator from Ohio thinks it may be. I know that the Senator from Arkansas, who led the fight against reorganization of the welfare department, will see to it that that question is taken care of, because I know he does not want a measure that will create controversy.

Mr. SMITH of New Jersey. I did not know that that question was involved in this matter.

Mr. LUCAS. I read the bill in a hurry, and it seemed to me that it would amend the War Powers Act of World War I. In that act there are certain reorganization features, and those provisions are still in the bill, with certain amendments thereto.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. May I ask the distinguished majority leader, in view of his last statement—with which I am in total agreement, except that I think it should go much further—whether he feels that the bill introduced by him can be submitted to a legislative committee and brought back to the Senate this week after having been considered in the committee? It is intended that it is to be one of the measures which will be debated on the floor before the Senate takes a final adjournment?

Mr. LUCAS. I am not sure that it will be. I am not certain how far we will get. I know that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], chairman of the Finance Committee, hopes to have taken up tomorrow the excess-profits-tax bill. In addition to that, there is the appropriation bill to be considered. But the bill I have been discussing is one which I am satisfied will not take very long. I am sure that the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, headed by the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, can dispose of the bill in a very short while. There may be some little difficulty in striking out certain language dealing with reorganization, but I am satisfied that no Senator is going to object to what the executive branch of the Government is trying to do in the matter. I am also satisfied, from the conversation which the Senator from Arkansas had with representatives of the executive branch, that he feels the same way about it.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the minority leader correctly understand that before a recess is taken it will be the purpose of the majority leader to have the Senate consider the excess-profits-tax bill, the appropriation bill, and this particular amendment to title I of the War Powers Act? Is that the program?

Mr. LUCAS. That is the program, plus the fact that if the defense measure comes up we should like to consider that also. Whether we can do so is another question. But I do not believe the Senate can afford to pass up anything which is absolutely essential to the war effort, even if we have to return next week. No one wants to enjoy the holidays any more than does the Senator from Illinois, but, on the other hand, if we cannot get this proposed legislation passed, we shall be compelled to work right up to the 3d day of January.

Mr. WHERRY. I appreciate that it is very difficulty to say how long the Senate will be in session; but I understand that it will possibly take until Saturday night to conclude consideration of the excess-profits-tax bill, and if the other matters mentioned by the Senator from Illinois are brought up, and if they are not concluded, it is the intention to hold the Senate in session to give consideration to the bill the Senator has just been discussing.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator is correct. I can probably tell the Senate with more accuracy as to the situation after we see what happens to the tax bill. It is a very technical bill, as those who have been listening to the testimony and arguments in executive session well know. It is quite different from the House bill. The Senator from Georgia would know more about it than does the Senator from Illinois. But I will say that it is not an easy bill.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Does the Senator from Illinois understand that under the provisions of the bill which we have been discussing it would be possible for the President, by Executive order, to create a department of health and welfare?

Mr. LUCAS. I do not know, I will say to the Senator from Maine. I saw the bill only this morning, but it does contain reorganization features. Certainly that is a question to which the committee should give consideration. I am not clear on that point.

The bill (S. 4264) to amend and extend certain provisions of the First War Powers Act, 1941, introduced by Mr. LUCAS, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

PROHIBITION OF TRANSPORTATION OF GAMBLING DEVICES IN INTERSTATE AND FOREIGN COMMERCE—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3357) to prohibit transportation of gambling devices in interstate and foreign commerce.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] to recommit the conference report to the conferees, with certain instructions.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada.

THE GAMBLING DEVICE LEGISLATION MOTION TO RETURN TO CONFERENCE COMMITTEE—INSTRUCT SENATE CONFEREES STAY WITH SENATE BILL

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I shall take only a few minutes of the time of the Senate.

AMBIGUOUS BILL—MAY INCLUDE PARI-MUTUELS

I want to say again, as I said yesterday, that this bill is not simply a slot-machine bill. It is ambiguously worded and may include any gambling device. It is a roulette-wheel bill; or, if the attorneys who called me this morning are correct, it will also include pari-mutuel machines.

NO OBJECTION TO SENATE BILL

Mr. President, I wish to say that the junior Senator from Nevada has no objection at all to the Senate bill as passed. The Senate bill merely provided that the governor of a State may certify to the Attorney General that the use of such gambling devices is permitted in his State, and no new legislation was necessary.

The House bill is a complicated and ambiguous bill, because it attempts to define gambling devices in a rather loose manner. I have been advised by attorneys that it is wide open and that the court might well decide that wheels of fortune—roulette and pari-mutuel machines are included.

MOVE TO RECOMMIT

So the motion of the junior Senator from Nevada is to recommit the report to the conference committee with instructions to the Senate conferees to stay with the Senate bill as passed, which was written and submitted to the Senate by the Attorney General of the United States, in accordance with the resolution of the attorneys general of the United States in their regular annual conference early this year. There is no statement to the effect that the Attorney General intended any other legislation.

SERIOUS QUESTION OF CONSTITUTIONALITY

Mr. President, there is a serious question, as I am advised by attorneys, as to the constitutionality of the legislation, because it nullifies State law.

The Constitution of the United States in the tenth amendment says:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Doing indirectly what we dare not do directly has the effect of nullifying the right of a State to pass legislation within the framework of the Constitution of the United States.

CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL—STATES' RIGHTS

The great Chief Justice Marshall said:

The power to tax is the power to destroy.

We have found that out. It is equally true that the power to regulate is the power to destroy. What is sought to be done by this proposed act is to destroy, under the guise of regulation, industries in certain States which those States, within their sovereign powers, have already legalized.

Mr. President, now someone in an administrative or enforcement capacity has had the affrontery to determine there is something evil per se about gambling. That person or persons seek to eliminate it in spite of the fact that the powers reserved to the States include the right of each State to legislate on gambling as it desires. These persons opposed to gambling seek to inflict their views upon all the States by means of this act forbidding the passage in interstate commerce of all gambling devices. Under the guise of regulating they seek to destroy, what is a gigantic industry in many States.

To regulate under the interstate commerce clause there must be concern for the health, lives, and property of the people as a whole. Congress has no general power to enact police regulations. The power to make the ordinary police regulations remains with the individual States and cannot be assumed by the National Government—Southern Express Co. v. Whittle (69 Southern 652 (Ala.)).

SENATOR TAFT—PARI-MUTUEL MACHINES

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MALONE. I am happy to yield to the senior Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. I have had some inquiries from people in Ohio who operate race tracks in my State with respect to whether the enactment of the bill would prohibit the transportation of pari-mutuel machines, which are used in connection with the operation of race tracks.

As I read the conference report it seems to me that under the first paragraph of the bill there probably was at least the possibility of that being done. I would not object to the bill if it recognized that where it was legal in a State to do so a person would have the right to ship in such machines.

As I understand, under the conference report the Legislature of Ohio would be required to enact a new law if it wished to permit the shipment of such machines into the State of Ohio.

I am not perfectly clear as to the nature of pari-mutuel machines and whether they would be covered by the pending bill. It seems to me that there would be at least a fair claim under subsection (1) (B) that the machines would be covered. If that is a fact, I certainly would prefer to have the bill go back to the committee and to have it reconsidered in connection with the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE].

SENATOR JOHNSON

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MALONE. I am happy to yield for a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may reply to the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). The Senator from Colorado requests unanimous consent that he may reply to the Senator from Ohio without prejudice to the right of the Senator from Nevada to have the floor. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The bill which we are considering today in the form of a conference report was not intended to cover anything but slot machines. It does not cover anything but slot machines. It does not in any way affect pari-mutuel machines of any kind, including totalizators, or any of the other types of machines used in connection with horse racing. It does not cover gadgets which are used in pari-mutuel betting. It covers only slot machines. I will say to the Senator from Ohio, with respect to a State's rights, when machines are shipped into a State they must be shipped from some other State. The bill is unusual in that it would make it possible for any State to permit slot machines to be shipped into it.

SENATOR TAFT

Mr. TAFT. Is that not true of the Senate bill? As I understand, the present bill seems to be broader than the Senate bill. The chief difference is that a State would have to pass a new statute if it wanted to have permission to import from another State such devices.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. In order to have permission to ship slot machines into a State it would be necessary to pass a legislative act to that effect.

Mr. TAFT. I am not so much concerned with slot machines as I am with pari-mutuel machines.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The bill does not touch any other machines. It does not touch pari-mutuel machines. The language in the House bill is narrower.

Mr. TAFT. This is the language to which I was referring:

(1) Any so-called slot machine or any other machine or mechanical device an essential part of which is a drum or reel with insignia thereon, * * * (B) by the operation of which a person may become entitled to receive, as the result of the application of an element of chance, any money or property.

There is nothing in that language which refers to any coins. Subsection (1) (A) speaks of coins. Subsection (1) (B) does not refer to coins. It would seem to me, therefore, that a pari-mutuel machine might be fairly considered to be operated with a drum or reel. The bill would cover roulette machines, and it might be broad enough to include pari-mutuel machines. I do not know anything about pari-mutuel racing machines. Some persons in my State who are interested in pari-mutuel racing seem to have become quite concerned about the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Pari-mutuel machines do not use any drum or mechanical devices like those used in slot machines.

Mr. TAFT. It must be some sort of machine.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The machine used in horse racing is a four-legged machine, a horse. If the horse comes in first the man who played the horse gets paid. It is not a matter of chance.

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MALONE. I am happy to yield with the same understanding.

Mr. O'CONOR. As the Senator knows, a number of States have legalized pari-mutuel betting on horse racing. Does the Senator feel that the shipment of equipment for repair in interstate commerce would be permitted, assuming a State had legalized the use of totalizators and other pari-mutuel equipment?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. There is nothing in the bill which would prohibit or hinder in any way the shipment of pari-mutuel paraphernalia into any State. It would not restrict any such shipment in the slightest degree.

Mr. O'CONOR. It was my understanding that it was not the intention of the committee to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The intention of the committee, the intention of the Crime Commission, the intention of the Attorney General, the intention of the Senate Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which the Senator from Maryland is an honored and very useful member, the intention of the Senate itself, and the intention of the conferees appointed by the Senate were to confine the proposed legislation specifically to slot machines, and to nothing else.

Mr. O'CONOR. Carrying out the Senator's thought, it is my understanding that legal opinion has already been secured which supports the Senator's statement in that respect.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. That is correct.

SENATOR MALONE—INTENTIONS OF COMMITTEE HONEST

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, there is no question in the mind of the junior Senator from Nevada that the senior Senator from Colorado is absolutely honest in what he says that the bill was intended to apply only to slot machines.

There is also no question in any one's mind that the provisions of the bill include all wheels of chance in addition to slot machines, including wheels of fortune, roulette wheels, and the like. All such wheels bear insignia of some kind.

CARD FROM PARI-MUTUEL CARRIES INSIGNIA

Attorneys from States where horse racing and pari-mutuel devices for gambling are legalized have expressed the opinion that such pari-mutuel machines could well come under the definitions of the proposed act, in that the card or ticket which the bettor receives comes out of the machine, when he lays down his money on a particular horse.

Therefore it could very easily be declared by a court decision that a pari-mutuel machine comes within the purview of the pending bill.

DEFINITION OF GAMBLING DEVICES—AMBIGUOUS

There is no question that gambling devices, as commonly known, marked with numbers or insignia, are included in the bill. The bill, however, as Senator TAFT, the senior Senator from Ohio, has so ably said is not clear. It is ambiguous. That is why the junior Senator from Nevada has moved to recommit the report to conference, with instructions to the Senate conferees that the Senate bill, which everyone can understand, be agreed to.

SENATE BILL—GOVERNOR TO CERTIFY TO UNITED STATES ATTORNEY GENERAL

Everyone can understand the Senate bill. Under the Senate bill it would not be necessary to pass a new bill in Ohio, Nevada, Mississippi, or in any other State.

All that would be required would be for the governor of a State to certify to the Attorney General that the use of such a machine is legal in his State. That is all that would be necessary.

STATES LEGALIZING HORSE RACING

States in which pari-mutuel machines have been legalized in connection with horse racing, are California, New Jersey, Illinois, Maryland, Kentucky, Delaware, Michigan, Massachuetts, Louisiana, Florida, Rhode Island, Arkansas, New Hampshire, and Nevada. I believe the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado should be given an opportunity to clarify the bill.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to complete the record, and with that I submit the case to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to address certain questions to the distinguished senior Senator from Colorado with reference to the committee's understanding and his understanding of the meaning of certain wording in the conference bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). The Chair will recognize the Senator from Colorado if he wishes to be recognized.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. HOLLAND. In common with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. O'CONOR], who has already voiced his apprehension, and Senators from other States than the States of Maryland and Florida which have legalized pari-mutuel betting on certain races, the Senator from Florida is somewhat concerned about the wording of certain portions of the conference report. He invites the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that the original Senate bill makes it very clear that a gambling device, as defined by that bill, is limited to a device "designed or adapted for gambling or any use by which the user"—I repeat the words "the user"—"as a result of the application of any element of chance may become entitled to receive, directly or indirectly, anything of value."

On the other hand, the bill recommended by the conference report omits the words "the user." The Senator from Florida merely wishes to clarify for the RECORD that portion of the wording of the conference bill which uses these words in defining the term "gambling device." I now read from the conference bill:

> That as used in this act the term "gambling device" means——
> (1) any so-called "slot machine" or any other machine or mechanical device an essential part of which is a drum or reel with insignia thereon, and (A) which when operated may deliver, as the result of the application of an element of chance, any money or property, or—

The Senator from Florida is particularly concerned by the words which follow—

> (B) by the operation of which a person may become entitled to receive, as the result of the application of an element of chance, any money or property.

The Senator from Florida invites the attention of the Senator from Colorado to the fact that under this subdivision (B) in section 1 of the conference bill the result may come not only to the user but also to any other person than the user. I wish to be very sure that that language does not permit the application of the bill to a totalizator used in pari-mutuel racing, which is nothing in the world but a complex computing machine or device. The question which the Senator from Florida wishes to address to the Senator from Colorado at this time is this:

Is it not true that subdivision (B) in section 1 of the conference bill cannot in any situation apply to a totalizator because of the fact that subdivision (B) includes, as a necessary element, that provision stated in the words "as the result of the application of an element of chance," whereas in the use and operation of a totalizator there is and can be no element of chance whatever, the machine being purely a computing machine, which, using the figures and facts which are committed to it, delivers, as a result of its computation, fixed and certain results, and there being no element of chance whatever entering into the operation of the computing machine which is referred to generally as a totalizator?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida has stated the case very clearly. The bill does not affect in any way any adding machine or any computing machine of any description or kind. It cannot do so. The sentence which begins with "(B)" in line 20 is part of the whole sentence and is controlled by the language preceding it. There is nothing in the conference report which in any way affects in the slightest degree any of the paraphernalia used in pari-mutuel betting. This language applies only to slot machines. It seems to me that the description which is given in the bill is clear, and that it is clear that it applies only to slot machines.

Mr. HOLLAND. I thank the Senator. Can it be said with complete accuracy that, in order to be in any way affected by the bill, if it be enacted, a machine or device, a slot machine, or any other piece of paraphernalia would necessarily have to include in its own essential operation an element of chance?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The Senator is correct. There would have to be an element of chance. Also, it would have to be operated. The language is "which, when operated, may deliver, as the result of the application of the element of chance, any money or property." Those two conditions accurately describe a slot machine.

Mr. HOLLAND. And the absence of an element of chance in the operation of any kind of an accounting or computing machine, and particularly of that machine which is generally referred to as a totalizator, entirely prevents the application of the conference bill to any such machine?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The Senator is positively correct.

Mr. HOLLAND. The Senator from Colorado has been most kind. I should like to ask him one further question. Is it equally true that any subassembly or essential part of any such computing machine or totalizator would likewise be wholly outside the field of operation of the proposed legislation, as embraced in the conference report?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. The Senator is correct. The bill would not in any way affect any machine, or any part of a machine, used for calculating purposes. I say again that the bill would not in any way affect any paraphernalia used in pari-mutuel betting—either repairs, parts, or old machines.

With reference to this matter, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted at this point two letters signed by the Attorney General, Howard McGrath.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 19, 1950.

Hon. EDWIN C. JOHNSON,
Chairman, Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: As you know, in connection with the Attorney General's conference on organized crime, the Department of Justice cooperated in the preparation of the bill to prohibit the transportation of gambling devices, which you introduced in the Senate as S. 3357. In the various stages through which the bill passed, including amendment by the House, it was never my understanding or the Department's intention that the bill was intended to prohibit the transportation of totalizers used in parimutuel betting at race tracks in States where such operations are legal. I was therefore interested to observe that in today's debate preceding the approval of the conference report by the Senate statements were made on the floor which would tend to establish as a matter of legislative history that the bill was not intended to apply to such totalizers.

Sincerely,

HOWARD MCGRATH,
Attorney General.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., December 19, 1950.

Hon. EDWIN C. JOHNSON,
Chairman, Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The Department of Justice participated in the consideration and drafting of the House of Representatives amendments to S. 3357, a bill to prohibit the transportation of gambling devices. We approve the bill as passed in the House, and we urge the Senate to adopt it in that form.

Sincerely,

HOWARD MCGRATH,
Attorney General.

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to address the Senate for 2 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent to address the Senate for 2 minutes. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Nevada is recognized.

SUMMATION

Mr. MALONE. Mr. President, in view of the colloquy which has just taken place on the floor of the Senate, I wish to say that attorneys, who have communicated with me this morning, from the States where horse racing is conducted through the betting mediums of parimutuel machines say that there is a very good chance that the machines may be included through the ambiguous language and construction of this bill.

They say that each bet made changes the odds and that the percentage is retained by the machine in the calculations.

The percentage remains the same, but the element of chance is affected by the amount of money bet. Attorneys from California and other States have told me that there is a very serious question involved, and that a court might rule that such devices are included in the conference report as now constructed.

There is no doubt but that the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON] intended that devices generally should not be included—there is, however, little doubt but that many of them are included in the ambiguous language and construction of the bill as returned to the Senate by the Senate conferees—therefore I submit that the wise course is to return it to the conference committee with instructions to stay with the Senate bill.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, apparently the debate on this question has ended. I suggest the absence of a quorum so that we may vote upon the pending motion and upon the adoption of the conference report, if that is agreeable to the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum has been suggested. The clerk will therefore call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Byrd	Cordon
Anderson	Capehart	Donnell
Benton	Carlson	Douglas
Brewster	Chapman	Dworshak
Bricker	Chavez	Eastland
Bridges	Clements	Ecton
Butler	Connally	Ellender
Frear	Lehman	Pastore
Fulbright	Long	Pepper
George	Lucas	Robertson
Gurney	McCarran	Russell
Hayden	McCarthy	Saltonstall
Hendrickson	McClellan	Schoeppel
Hickenlooper	McFarland	Smith, Maine
Hill	McKellar	Smith, N. J.
Hoey	McMahon	Smith, N. C.
Holland	Magnuson	Stennis
Humphrey	Malone	Taft
Hunt	Martin	Taylor
Ives	Maybank	Thomas, Okla.
Jenner	Millikin	Thomas, Utah
Johnson, Colo.	Morse	Thye
Johnson, Tex.	Mundt	Tobey
Johnston, S. C.	Murray	Tydings
Kem	Myers	Watkins
Kerr	Neely	Wherry
Kilgore	Nixon	Wiley
Knowland	O'Conor	Williams
Langer	O'Mahoney	Young

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MALONE] to recommit the conference report to the conferees, with instructions that the Senate conferees insist on the bill as passed by the Senate.

The motion was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. FREAR was excused from attendance on the session of the Senate for the remainder of the day.

PREVENTION OF PENALTIES FOR FAILURE TO MEET ESTIMATED TAX REQUIREMENTS BY REASON OF INCREASES UNDER REVENUE ACT OF 1950

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order of the Senate, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] is recognized at this time.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me briefly?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am going to report a bill and a joint resolution from the Committee on Finance, and ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration. I shall make a brief statement which I think will show the necessity for the enactment of the proposed legislation.

From the Committee on Finance, I report favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 9913) to prevent penalties and additions to tax in case of failure to meet requirements with respect to estimated tax by reason of increases imposed by the Revenue Act of 1950, and I submit a report (No. 2681) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WHERRY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. President, although I shall not object, I should like to have the RECORD show that the privilege of the floor is now being extended by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER], in order to comply with the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Georgia, and that such action on the part of the Senator from North Dakota does not prejudice his right to obtain the floor immediately after this measure and the one which I understand is to follow it have been disposed of.

Mr. GEORGE. I thought that was understood, and I so request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well.

Will the Senator from Georgia please give us a review or résumé of the bill?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this bill and the joint resolution which I shall report in a few minutes are reported unanimously by the Finance Committee. In the committee there was no disagreement whatever regarding these measures, both of which come to the Senate from the House. In the committee we made no amendment of them.

The enactment of this first measure, House bill 9913, is made necessary by virtue of the fact that in the 1950 Tax Act we increased the rate of individual income taxes. Those taxpayers would be required to make a reestimate of their tax liability to avoid a penalty, unless this bill were passed. The bill simply removes the necessity for a reestimate of tax in the present taxable year. That is all this bill does.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well. Will the Chair put the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. 9913) was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR FILING OF TAX RETURNS BY MEMBERS OF THE ARMED FORCES

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Dakota will further yield to me, I now report favorably, from the Finance Committee, House Joint Resolution 554, amending section 3804 of the Internal Revenue Code, and I submit a report (No. 2682) thereon.

I desire to make some general observations with respect to this measure. It was unanimously approved by the Finance Committee without amendment. It provides for a restoration of section 3804 of the Revenue Act of 1941. This measure simply extends the time for the filing of returns for the payment of taxes by soldiers and others connected with the armed forces in Korea, or in other combat areas, until 180 days after their return to the States or after their discharge from hospitals. The joint resolution also postpones the payment of their taxes during this period of suspension. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. WHERRY. Will the Chair please put the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 554) was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to thank the distinguished Senator from North Dakota for his courtesy, and also to thank the majority and minority leaders.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE BUSINESS

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from North Dakota yield for the purpose of permitting Senators at this time, without debate, to make insertions in the record, introduce bills and joint resolutions, and so forth?

Mr. LANGER. I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Unanimous consent is requested that the Senator from North Dakota may yield for the transaction of routine business, including insertions in the record, without prejudice to his right to the floor. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CIVIL DEFENSE—RESOLUTION OF VETERANS' ORGANIZATIONS, SPARTA, WIS.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I have in my hand a fine resolution adopted by veterans' organizations of Sparta, Wis., on the urgent issue of civil defense. I am proud that my State of Wisconsin has pioneered in grass-roots civil defense activity but what we have done is still merely a tiny fraction of what must be done in Wisconsin and throughout the Nation if our people are to be prepared for the worst.

I ask unanimous consent that this brief resolution be printed in the RECORD, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPARTA, WIS., December 16, 1950.

Hon. ALEXANDER WILEY,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Perilous conditions confronting every citizen, every community and the United States as a Nation, demand immediate and effective governmental direction.

The combined membership of the organizations represented hereon, urgently request your immediate and utmost effort to the end that vital Civil Defense legislation be effected and administered with the least practicable delay.

Commander, American Veterans' of World War II, Monroe County Post, No. 17, Sparta, Wis.

GERALD MCMULLIN,
Commander, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Major General R. B. McCoy Post, No. 2112, Sparta, Wis.

LATVIA INDEPENDENCE DAY—RESOLUTION OF UNITED AMERICAN LATVIAN COUNCIL OF NEW YORK

Mr. O'CONOR. Mr. President, the United American Latvian Council of New York, which is comprised of a number of persons of Latvian birth and ancestry who are loyal and patriotic American citizens, has a very keen interest in any diplomatic or other movements that would tend to better the conditions of the people of their homeland.

On the occasion of the commemoration of the proclamation of the independence of the Republic of Latvia on November 18, 1950, at Webster Hall, New York City, the United American Latvian Council of New York adopted resolutions on the matter of Soviet occupation and absorption of the Baltic countries, and urging ratification of the Genocide Convention, which deserve the attention of the Members of Congress.

I therefore ask unanimous consent to have the resolutions printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK, November 18, 1950.

RESOLUTIONS UNANIMOUSLY ADOPTED AT THE COMMEMORATION OF THE PROCLAMATION OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE REPUBLIC OF LATVIA ON NOVEMBER 18, 1950, AT WEBSTER HALL, NEW YORK CITY, UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE NEW YORK LATVIAN SOCIETY AND THE UNITED AMERICAN LATVIAN COUNCIL OF NEW YORK

Whereas the Latvian people all over the world, whether residents of the United States of America and other free countries, refugees still waiting for a haven to settle, or ill-fated victims of aggression and oppression in Soviet-occupied Latvia and Russian slave-labor camps, are this day, the anniversary of the proclamation of Latvia's independence 32 years ago, united in prayer for the liberation of their Soviet-subjugated native country and nation; and

Whereas all Latvian people, honoring this day the leaders and veterans of the struggle for freedom who paved and opened the road to independence for Latvia, above all mournfully pay tribute to the countless victims of Soviet terror who have lost their lives, or are subjected to continuous suffering, virtual slavery, or mass deportations to slave labor in Russia, merely because of their unwillingness to endorse the cruel and godless regime of their alien Bolshevik oppressors; and

Whereas the brutal and unwarranted occupation and the perfidiously engineered absorption of the Baltic countries into the Soviet Union have never been recognized by the Governments of the United States and other western democracies which continue to uphold the legal existence of the independent Republics of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia, and their diplomatic representatives: Be it therefore

Resolved, That we, citizens and residents of the United States of Latvian descent, gathered today to commemorate the Independence Day of Latvia and to prayerfully remember the extreme sufferings of the Latvian Nation, gratefully acknowledge the steadfast refusal of the President, Congress, and people of the United States of America to recognize the purported annexation of the Baltic Republics, Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia, by the Soviet Union; and be it further

Resolved, That we, in order to strengthen and keep alive the confidence of the Baltic peoples in the ultimate victory of the free world, respectfully petition the President to render them every possible assistance of the American Government: By publicly restating America's nonrecognition of the Soviet occupation and absorption of the Baltic countries; by persuading and inducing the Senate to ratify and proclaim the genocide convention, adopted by the United Nations, as an effective means of exposing and combating the crime of genocide in Soviet-dominated countries, and by establishing liaison with the Soviet-harassed Baltic peoples, activating the Voice of America broadcasts in the Latvian, Lithuanian, and Estonian languages, always realizing that the restoration of human rights and indpendence to the Baltic nations constitute an integral condition for world peace, based on international law and justice; and be it further

Resolved, To salute and endorse the courageous stand of the President of the United States against further Soviet aggression and extension of the iron curtain, and the leadership of the American Government and its representatives in the United Nations in their present attempts to stop, even by resorting to armed resistance as in Korea, the mendacious war provocations of a handful of Stalinite conspirators, aiming at total world domination through complete extinction of liberty, veracity, and justice everywhere in the world; and be it finally

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be submitted to the President, the Secretaries of State and Defense, Members of both Houses of the Congress, the Governor of the State of New York, the Secretary General of the United Nations, the diplomatic and consular representatives of Latvia, Lithuania, and Estonia, and the press.

GUIDO TRUCE,
President of the New York Latvian Society.

HARRY W. LIELNORS,
President of the United American Latvian Council of New York.

REORGANIZATIONS IN THE EXECUTIVE BRANCH—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE (S. REPT. NO. 2680)

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, I submit, pursuant to law, a report relating to reorganizations in the executive branch of the Government, and ask that it be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received, and, without objection, it will be printed, as requested by the Senator from Arkansas.

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE PROGRAM—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER], from the Committee on Armed Services, I report an original bill (S. 4268) to authorize a Federal civil-defense program, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 2683) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. IVES:

S. 4263. A bill for the relief of Lee Oy Gum; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. LUCAS introduced Senate bill 4264, to amend and extend certain provisions of the First War Powers Act, 1941, which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and appears under a separate heading.)

By Mr. O'CONOR:

S. 4265. A bill to prohibit the transfer of strategic commodities to countries whose armed forces are in conflict with Armed Forces of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McCLELLAN (for himself and Mr. O'CONOR):

S. 4266. A bill to amend and extend title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

By Mr. McCARRAN:

S. 4267. A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to provide better facilities for the enforcement of the customs and immigration laws," approved June 26, 1930, as amended; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(Mr. CHAPMAN (for Mr. KEFAUVER), from the Committee on Armed Services, reported an original bill (S. 4268) to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes, which was ordered to be placed on the calendar, and appears under a separate heading.)

AMENDMENT OF CERTAIN PROVISIONS OF FIRST WAR POWERS ACT, 1941—AMENDMENTS

Mr. McCLELLAN submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4264) to amend and extend certain provisions of the First War Powers Act, 1941, which were referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred, as indicated:

H. R. 3229. An act to amend the Internal Revenue Code, as amended, and the Federal Alcohol Administration Act, as amended; and

H. R. 9911. An act to authorize the payment by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs of a gratuitous indemnity to survivors of members of the Armed Forces who die in active service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

H. R. 8848. An act to provide for a study of the mental and physical sequelae of malnutrition and starvation suffered by prisoners of war and civilian internees during Revenue Code, as amended, and the Federal World War II; to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare.

H. R. 9828. An act to authorize relief of authorized certifying officers of terminated war agencies in liquidation by the Department of Labor; to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

[Mr. KEM asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article regarding the attempted purchase of friendship abroad, by George Sokolsky, published in the Washington Times-Herald, December 19, 1950, which appears in the Appendix.]

CONGRESSIONAL IMMUNITY AND THE CITIZEN—ARTICLE BY NATHAN BOONE WILLIAMS

[Mr. HUNT asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "Congressional Immunity and the Citizen," written by Nathan Boone Williams, and published in the current issue of the District of Columbia Bar Association Journal, which appears in the Appendix.]

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

As in executive session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which was referred to the Committee on Armed Services.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, from the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

One hundred and sixty-two postmasters.

NOMINATION OF ANNA M. ROSENBERG TO BE ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF DEFENSE—EXECUTIVE REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. BYRD, from the Committee on Armed Services, submitted a report (Ex. Rept. No. 16) on the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg, to be Assistant Secretary of Defense, which was ordered to be printed.

MILLARD E. TYDINGS

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I should like to read into the body of the RECORD a resolution which was adopted unanimously this morning by the Armed Services Committee. The purpose of the resolution will become clear when I read it. It reads as follows:

MILLARD E. TYDINGS

To do proper honor to him and in recognition of his long and distinguished service to his State and Nation, we, his colleagues on the Senate Armed Services Committee, are privileged to present to MILLARD E. TYDINGS, our departing chairman, this commemorative scroll.

A statesman and a patriot, he has at all times labored diligently and unselfishly for his country's welfare. His 35 years of congressional service, following distinguished and heroic participation in World War I, have been marked by his clear awareness of the need for vigilance and preparedness. His wisdom in fighting tirelessly for adequate defense measures is impressively borne out against the backdrop of world tension and conflict today.

It has indeed been fortunate for our Nation that MILLARD E. TYDINGS' leadership of the Senate Armed Services Committee has so effectively promoted those principles of preparedness in which he and we so strongly believe. He has guided with skill and rare ability the work of this committee during these past two critical years. His wide experience and keen judgment have been of inestimable value to his colleagues as they have faced the great and grave problems that have so often arisen.

As he has been friend to us as well as chairman, we have been honored by warm, personal association with him. His absence will hence be felt the more keenly. Our sincere good wishes go with him in all future undertakings. With a sense of high privilege we here set down our signatures in testimony of our respect and friendship for MILLARD E. TYDINGS.

RICHARD B. RUSSELL, HARRY FLOOD BYRD, VIRGIL M. CHAPMAN, LYNDON B. JOHNSON, ESTES KEFAUVER, LESTER C. HUNT, STYLES BRIDGES, CHAN GURNEY, LEVERETT SALTONSTALL, WAYNE MORSE, WILLIAM F. KNOWLAND, HARRY P. CAIN.

S. 3910. An act relating to the assignment of surplus clerks in the Postal Transportation Service;

S. 4102. An act relating to contracts for the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes or other mechanical devices;

S. 4229. An act to extend to certain persons who served in the military, naval, or air service on or after June 27, 1950, the benefits of Public Law No. 16, Seventy-eighth Congress, as amended;

S. 4240. An act to amend the act incorporating The American Legion so as to redefine eligibility for membership therein;

S. 4254. An act to redefine eligibility for membership in AMVETS (American Veterans of World War II); and

S. J. Res. 209. Joint resolution to amend and extend the provisions of the District of Columbia Emergency Rent Act, as amended.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

On his own request, and by unanimous consent, Mr. TOBEY was excused from attendance on the remainder of the session of the Senate today.

FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO YUGOSLAVIA—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, with the understanding that it is without prejudice to the right of the Senator from North Dakota to the floor, I ask unanimous consent to call up the conference report on Senate bill 4234, to provide aid to Yugoslavia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I submit a conference report on the bill (S. 4234) to promote the foreign policy and provide for the defense and general welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina in the chair). The report will be read for the information of the Senate.

The report was read by the legislative clerk, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4234) to promote the foreign policy and provide for the defense and general welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the House amendment insert the following:

"That this Act may be cited as the 'Yugoslav Emergency Relief Assistance Act of 1950'.

"SEC. 2. The President is hereby authorized to expend not in excess of $50,000,000 of the funds heretofore appropriated for expenses necessary to carry out the provisions of the Economic Cooperation Act of 1948, as amended (Public Law 759, Eighty-first Congress), for the purpose of providing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia under the authority of this Act.

"SEC. 3. No assistance under authority of this Act shall be made available nor shall any funds appropriated hereunder be expended until an agreement is entered into between Yugoslavia and the United States containing the following undertakings, and any others the President may determine to be desirable, on the part of Yugoslavia:

"(a) To make available to the Government of the United States local currency in amounts required by it to meet its local currency administrative and operating expenses in Yugoslavia in connection with assistance supplied under this Act.

"(b) To give full and continuous publicity through the press, radio, and all other available media in Yugoslavia to the assistance furnished by the United States; and to allow to the United States, in cooperation with Yugoslavia, the use of such media as may be required to accomplish this purpose.

"(c) To permit persons designated by the Government of the United States to observe and supervise without restriction the distribution by Yugoslavia of commodities and other assistance made available under the authority of this Act, and to the extent necessary for this purpose to permit full freedom of movement of such persons within Yugoslavia and full access to communication and information facilities.

"(d) To make equitable distribution to the people in Yugoslavia of the commodities made available under this Act, as well as similar commodities produced locally or imported from outside sources, without discrimination as to race or political or religious belief.

"(e) Whenever relief supplies furnished under this Act are sold for local currency by the Government of Yugoslavia, to use an equivalent amount of such currency to provide relief to needy persons and to children, and for charitable, medical, and such other purposes as may be mutually agreed upon.

"(f) To take all appropriate economic measures to reduce its relief needs, to encourage increased production and distribution of foodstuffs within Yugoslavia, and to lessen the danger of similar future emergencies.

"SEC. 4. All of the funds made available under authority of this Act shall be utilized to the fullest practicable extent in the purchase of the commodities from the surplus commodities in the possession of the Commodity Credit Corporation at prices authorized by section 112 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, as amended.

"SEC. 5. Nothing in this Act shall be interpreted as endorsing measures undertaken by the present Government of Yugoslavia which suppress or destroy religious, political, and economic liberty, and the Yugoslav Government shall be so notified when aid is furnished under this Act.

"SEC. 6. At the termination of each three-month period after aid has been extended under this Act the Secretary of State shall make a full and detailed report to the Congress. Said three-month reports shall not be limited to, but shall include (1) information as to whether or not Yugoslavia is abiding by the agreement as provided for under section 3 of this Act; (2) information as to any developments in the attitude of Yugoslavia with respect to basic human rights.

"SEC. 7. All or any portion of the funds made available under authority of this Act may be transferred by the President to any department or agency of the executive branch of the Government to be expended for the purpose of this Act. Funds so transferred may be expended under the authority of any provisions of law, not inconsistent with this Act, applicable to the departments or agencies concerned, except that funds so transferred shall not be commingled with other funds of such departments or agencies and shall be accounted for separately.

"SEC. 8. Local currency made available to the United States by Yugoslavia under the provisions of the agreement required by section 3 may be used for local currency administrative and operating expenses in Yugoslavia in connection with assistance provided by this Act without charge against appropriated funds.

"SEC. 9. At least 50 per centum of the gross tonnage of any equipment, materials, or commodities made available under the provisions of this Act and transported on ocean vessels (computed separately for dry bulk carriers and dry cargo liners) shall be transported on United States-flag commercial vessels at market rates for United States-flag commercial vessels, if available.

"SEC. 10. All or any part of the assistance provided hereunder shall be promptly terminated by the President—

"(a) whenever he determines that (1) Yugoslavia is not complying fully with the undertakings in the agreement entered into under section 3 of this act, or is diverting from the purpose of this act assistance provided hereunder; or (2) because of changed conditions, continuance of assistance is unnecessary or undesirable, or no longer consistent with the national interest or the foreign policy of the United States;

"(b) Whenever the Congress, by concurrent resolution, finds termination is desirable.

"Termination of assistance to Yugoslavia under this section shall include the termination of deliveries of all supplies scheduled under this act and not yet delivered."

And the House agree to the same.

Managers on the Part of the Senate.

Managers on the Part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I should merely like to have the Senator from Arkansas call attention briefly, for the RECORD, to the differences between the Senate and House, and also to explain the nature of the compromise.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I may say to the minority leader that we had a very amicable conference with the House conferees. There was no real controversy. There are perhaps three points which may be of interest. One had to do with the counterpart provision, which was inserted by the Senate committee and adopted on the floor, which provided that whenever any of the goods were sold for local currencies, they should be subject to disposal by mutual agreement. It is a provision very similar to that which is in effect in ECA. As to this provision the House receded, and went along without any difficulty.

The next most important difference, I think, was with regard to the cost formula for the purchase of commodities. The conference agreed that the House provision might work very great difficulty in connection with the administration, and that the provision of section 112 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1948, as amended, should be adopted. It is exactly the same procedure which was followed in the setting of prices on commodities under the existing aid bill. The House agreed to that.

There was one other point. The Senate had provided that the words "if available" be included in the provision requiring 50 percent of the shipments to be in American bottoms. The House had stricken the words "if available." The conference reinserted the two words, to make the language conform to the Senate version.

In the conference, a paragraph of the preamble which had been inserted by the House was eliminated. The conferees agreed that it was unnecessary and would create certain implications unwarranted by the facts.

There was one other provision which is perhaps worthy of notice. I refer to the language requiring Yugoslavia to take apropriate economic measures to assist in the production of their own food supply, and in the elimination of certain difficulties which they have encountered as a result of the drought.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the conferees, in view of this measure having passed both Houses, have worked out what they conceived to be the very best possible bill to carry out the measure's announced objectives. It is not my purpose to criticize the report of the conferees, but I feel that this measure is a mistake of such magnitude that I should be derelict in my duty to my country were I not to raise my voice again in opposition to its final enactment. I certainly criticize no one who may disagree with me and who may hold views contrary to those that I shall express.

It is not my purpose to criticize them, but in this critical period in the history of the world, in this emergency in which our Nation is facing a crisis unparalleled in its history, at a time when we are, in all probability and from every indication we shall be compelled to draw upon all our resources, manpower, material, and economic resources, to the very limit to produce the maximum strength we can develop to resist communism and the aggression of communism, Mr. President, it is the height of stupidity for this Congress and for this Government to give $38,000,000, $50,000,000 or any other material assistance to any Communist dicator, Tito or any other Communist ruler or government.

Mr. President, this is supposed to be a relief bill. It is, in truth and in fact, a military assistance bill. I know, Mr. President, that when this bill came before the Senate it was passed by a vote of 60 to 21. The House, after 2 days of debate, passed it by a vote of 225 to 142. I am not unmindful, Mr. President, that my efforts now will fail, but I want this record clear. I do not believe that any impartial person can read the record of debate on this measure, or read the reports filed by the respective committees, and come to any conclusion other than that it is simply an attempt to coddle and to appease another Communist dictator.

Mr. President, to speak for this bill one has to concede, as all who supported it and advocated it did concede, that in the enactment of this measure we are taking what is termed a calculated risk. Mr. President, on the other side of it, this measure constitutes a calculated fraud instigated by Tito and being perpetrated on the American people. It is not even a gamble—we haven't a chance—we are the loser before we start.

What do we hope to gain? This bill is not necessary. The aid provided in it is not needed to prevent people from starving. It is needed only to enable Dictator Tito to carry out an industrial program for military purposes.

Let us see, Mr. President, if it is imperative that such legislation be enacted to help to prevent people from starving. Let us see if it is necessary to relieve the hungry and the distressed.

Mr. President, the records show, and I think these figures are undisputed, that notwithstanding the drought that has been represented to us to be so severe in Yugoslavia this year, Yugoslavia has produced 108 percent of her normal crop of sugar; she has produced 100 percent of her normal rice crop, 88 percent of wheat; 87 percent of barley, 83 percent of rye, 79 percent of oats, and 59 percent of her normal corn production.

Mr. President, we in America have suffered such reductions in normal crops in the past, and no one starved here, although our standard of production may have been higher.

Let us see what we are proposing to do. It is said, and I assume these statistics are not controverted—I have not found that they are disputed anywhere in the debate on the measure—it is said that in the postwar years, with millions of dollars, approximately $421,000,000 of direct aid from our country to Yugoslavia, she raised her daily calorie consumption per capita to 2,800. It is now agreed that even with the shortage in crops, her present food supply in agricultural products, without any aid from us, Yugoslavia has and can provide 2,300 calories daily for each person.

Mr. President, is that such a deficiency in food that it recommends to this Government in the present world crisis that we should provide by gift to Yugoslovia money and food sufficient to raise those calories up to 2,600 per person as this measure is intended to do? Mr. President, if that justifies this expenditure, then let us see where else we may have similar and even more pressing obligations, because, Mr. President, 2,300 calories is more abundant than the number of calories now consumed by half the populations of the world.

Brazil, our neighbor to the south, is consuming only 2,343 calories per capita daily; Chile is consuming only 2,351; Colombia, 2,283; Peru, 1,925; Japan, 1,834; Pakistan, 2,028; the Philippines, 1,908; Burma, 1,986; China, 2,115; India, 1,621.

Some of those nations certainly are our friends. Some of their people surely believe in liberty and in democracy and are opposed to dictator rule. If we are fighting the cause of freedom, Mr. President, and want to strengthen nations and give aid where it will be received with gratitude and used to help stem the tide of communistic aggression, we can better consider some of those countries, and give aid that might be appreciated by governments friendly to us and not an enemy as is the government and ruler of Yugoslavia.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Does the Senator from Arkansas have in mind that at the meetings of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, in Dublin, in September, to which a delegation from this body was sent and of which the Senator from Maine is a member, representatives of India, Ceylon, and Burma announced that we were in favor of colonialism and had given aid in the matter of food to other nations when their standard was very much higher than their own, and we had not given aid to them? In other words, apparently Communist propaganda had made very great inroads among their people, if we are to credit their representatives, to the proposition that our aid was wholly a matter, not of humanitarian sympathy, but of power and military expediency; that otherwise we should, as the Senator from Arkansas has pointed out, consider assisting the other suffering peoples of the world, and that we are cultivating a very great deal of distrust and suspicion by the manner in which our program is being carried out.

Mr. McCLELLAN. I wish to say to the able Senator from Maine that we have heard frequently on the floor of the Senate remarks to the effect that we must be careful in what we are doing so as not to give Communists an opportunity to make use of our actions for propaganda purposes. What will be thought by other peoples of the world whose distress is greater and whose purposes and hopes of liberty, freedom, independence, and democracy are in accord with ours when we, as the champions of freedom, direct aid to a military communistic dictator, who has disregarded, violated, and trampled upon every principle of righteousness for which we stand, in order to gain the power he holds today. Shall we provide Yugoslavia with 2,600 calories for her people and at the same time not turn a hand to aid those who are with us and not against us, and who are now living on far less than Yugoslavia already has?

Mr. President, by this act, innocent though it may be on the part of those who support it, we would definitely help a Communist dictator. With what benefit in mind to us shall we do it? That possibly, Mr. President—if Stalin moves, Tito will furnish some opposition. I may say, Mr. President, as I said in my remarks when the bill was up for consideration in the Senate:

If Stalin decides to move and does not decide to move directly against Tito, he will simply bypass Tito. In that case, Tito will not be in the way and will not come to our assistance or to the assistance of Europe. He will not come to our assistance until such time as we have the war so nearly won that he will want to jump in on the winning side, as Mussolini thought he was doing in World War II.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I yield.

Mr. KEM. In that connection, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas how many troops Tito or Yugoslavia has sent to Korea during the present engagements there.

Mr. McCLELLAN. The able Senator from Missouri is a moment ahead of me. I started to draw the example that we are in a crisis, with our boys being killed by the hordes of communism, to whose ideology and principles and purposes Tito subscribes. Mr. President, although Yugoslavia is a member of the United Nations, although the United Nations is the defender in Korea, not one soldier has Yugoslavia supplied. Not one soldier, Mr. President, not one single piece of armament will she supply when Stalin starts to march against the western powers. What are we doing? With this aid we would simply be building up Yugoslavia's economic strength. We would make it possible for her to continue her so-called 5-year industrial program without serious interruption. That 5-year program, of course, is to build up her industries, which is a commendable thing for any country to do. However, with the need for rehabilitation of the free world, in the name of heaven why should we, under the economic strain under which we shall have to labor to meet the crisis which confronts us, further weaken ourselves and expend our resources to help a Communist dictator upon whom we cannot rely?

Someone has said that by aiding Tito we would be taking a calculated risk. Mr. President, it would be necessary to calculate a long string of figures until it would be possible to get down to the point where we would not be taking a complete risk.

Mr. KEM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McCLELLAN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KEM. I should like to ask the Senator whether the importance of creating a feeling of solidarity among the countries of the Western Hemisphere has not often been pointed out. In that connection I should like to say to the Senator from Arkansas that within the last month I had occasion to visit five countries in Central America and also Mexico. In each one of the countries our party was frequently asked about the Marshall plan. It was pointed out to us that their countries had to meet the same conditions which Western Europe had to meet and for which the Marshall plan was intended as an alleviating factor. The people in those countries pointed out to us that they have difficulty in keeping up their standards of living. They pointed out to us that they are faced with the threat of Communist infiltration. They said to us, "The United States is sending these millions and millions of dollars all over Western Europe. Why is it that you do not realize our problems here right at home?"

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I appreciate the remarks of the Senator from Missouri. I do not wish unduly to extend my remarks. I simply wish to say that in this fight against communism, if this is the occasion when the blue chips are down, in all probability it will take all the resources that our Nation can marshal. Will we not learn from history? Are we to continue to repeat mistake after mistake?

Mr. President, the time has come for us to get away from the idea that every time it is proposed to give away some money we ought to go along with the suggestion on the basis of the calculated risk that somewhere in the future, somewhere down the line, we shall get some benefit from it.

Mr. President, if Tito needs food, let us buy something from Tito. Let us buy from him what he has to sell. Let us buy metals, ore, and the raw materials which his country produces and exports. Let us exchange food for such materials. Let us get something in return. Let us not tax the American people to hand out gratuities to murderers, to world banditis, and to those who subscribe to the philosophy that force will finally dominate our civilization.

Mr. President, others may do it but I shall not be a party to it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a further statement on the subject entitled "Yugoslavia and Tito."

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

YUGOSLAVIA AND TITO

The area of the country of Yugoslavia is 95,557 square miles, nearly the same area as that of the State of Oregon. The country is made up largely of what were the former Balkan states of Slovenia, Croatia, Bosnia, Dalmatia, and Serbia.

The population is approximately 16,000,000. This was the official figure for 1940, but it has increased very little due to large numbers of refugees and the fact that an estimated 1,700,000 have been killed during the wars since 1940. These peoples are made up of about 8,000,000 Serbs, 4,000,000 Croatians, 1,250,000 Slovenes, and the remainder of the 16,000,000 being a mixed population of Germans, Hungarians, Albanians, and Russians. In the book Tito's Imperial Communism, by the journalist, R. H. Markham, there is this comment on the peoples of Yugoslavia:

"There was no fixed ruling class in Yugoslavia, no submerged proletariat, no exploitation of one social stratum by another, but just political 'ins' and political 'outs.'

"There were about 16,000,000 common, hard-working men and women, most peasants, among whom were small groups and cliques and gangs of strong men, good and bad, struggling to decoy peasant votes in order to seize and maintain state power. These masters, who were peasants or the sons of peasants, used power partly for their own advantages and partly for the good of the people. As the state grew stronger and richer the might of these knights became greater and their takings vaster. In the same proportion the struggle of the outsiders to get inside increased in ferocity.

"I do not mean to condemn all Yugoslav politicians. They were like politicians in many other lands. Among them were good men who tried to serve the people and did serve the people. But I want to emphasize that the reports of a classic class struggle in Yugoslavia are largely a myth. The main struggle was and is for state power. What Tito and his Communists wanted, acquired, and are determined to hold is state power. Every other aspect of the new regime is of minor importance."

When Hitler occupied Yugoslavia, he found two distinct classes, one headed by Mihailovitch and the other by Tito. Tito headed the Communists and Mihailovitch the anti-Communists. The pact between Stalin and Hitler in 1939 is described by Markham as having the following effect upon the Communists in Yugoslavia:

"So, from the day Stalin and Hitler signed their pact in 1939, the Yugoslav Communists sprang into activity. Of course they were not against Germany. And naturally, they were not with England or France. Neither were they for Yugoslav unity. They were for the universal upheaval, following the guiding star of Russia and nothing else, serving Russia and no other power. They denounced the Allies in furious terms. They portrayed the war as exclusively a fight between blood-thirsty empires. They excoriated the whole capitalistic order and joyfully predicted its imminent collapse. They poured out streams of invectives against the Yugoslav Government and Regent and Army.

* * * * *

"As 1938 passed and 1940 passed and 1941 came, making the world situation more dangerous, the Communists stood, taut and tense, by day and by night, as racers waiting for the pistol shot. Their ears were strained to hear the signal giver, Moscow.

"When March 27 came, with all Serbians defying Hitler, the Communists at first ignored it as a futile bourgeois act, and then on March 28 attempted a futile counterrevolution. But their great moment had not yet come. The conspiratorial network was not created for the banal task of saving the fatherland, Yugoslavia. They had seven more weeks to wait for the clock of destiny to strike. Then Hitler attacked Russia. The detestable war between capitalist empires was transformed into a holy crusade. The day had dawned in preparation for which the Yugoslav Communists had spent their lives. They began their epochal role with a heroism and fanaticism rarely equaled in the heroic, fanatical Balkans.

"The breaking out of that struggle would be as the coming of the bridegroom; for it every bridesmaid kept her lamp burning and filled with oil. That was as basic in the faith of Yugoslav Communists as the Resurrection and Easter Day were in the faith of their Christian brothers. Many special signs had indicated that 'the hour' was approaching, and for it the Yugoslav Communists had put their conspiratorial machine in readiness. Couriers were on their toes to dash away with messages to every part of the kingdom. Communist officers in the Yugoslav Army were designated for certain key positions in the revolutionary army and leading civilian Communists were prepared to fill other military posts. The chief commissars were appointed, definite campaign plans had been agreed upon, methods for getting weapons had been worked out, local cells in vital points of operation were on the alert. The Communist underground machine was an armored locomotive resting on a hidden track under full steam. When the great day of June 22 came, the whistle blew and the locomotive sped to the attack.

* * * * *

"The forces of Mihailovitch operated in a different manner. In the first place they launched no revolution, since they considered their activity a function of the long-existing state and a continuation of the official anti-Hitler fight which was begun on March 27. They flew the Yugoslav flag and regular regimental banners, reestablished local Serbian authorities, sought to revive Serbian faith and courage, reassembled units of the Serbian Army, urged Serbs not to serve Germans, tried to prevent the Germans from confiscating Serbian stocks of food, restricted the movement of Germans, blew up vital military installations, and killed German agents.

"Mihailovitch and his Chetniks did not care to waste their forces in trying to take large cities in open battles. They preferred to avoid head-on clashes. They wanted to reorganize their shattered nation and prepare it for long, effective, wise resistance.

"Since these forces of Mihailovitch and Tito were fighting in a fairly small area, they soon found themselves in contact. And to avert clashes the leaders met. Mihailovitch and Tito conferred. They sought a plan for common action, but failed in their efforts. Tito wanted a separate revolutionary command for his forces; Mihailovitch demanded that all forces comprise a single army under one command, his own. So they disagreed, separated, and fought. Their soldiers began to kill each other; Yugoslavs shot Yugoslavs, as the German invaders cheered."

If Mihailovitch and Tito's forces could have continued to work together there might have been an entirely different story, but the issues between them were basic and could not be resolved. Most of the people of Serbia were peasants and artisans and had struggled for centuries for freedom, especially against the Turks. They therefore resisted the plans of Tito to convert them to communism and make them subservient to Moscow. The effect of this situation is described by Markham in this way:

"Of course, that meant civil war. Tito after long preparation had pulled a Fort Sumter. From the end of the summer of 1941, civil war raged in Yugoslavia, along with the war between Yugoslavs and Germans. The main struggle in Yugoslavia, after Tito's fateful invasion of Serbia, was the civil struggle between the Communists and anti-Communists. There were many dramatic secondary fights—indeed Yugoslav developments were as a labyrinth containing a dozen spots of intense interest—but the supreme struggle dominating all others, giving meaning to all others, providing an unchanging pattern in the chaos, was the fight between Communist totalitarianism and its opponents.

"Naturally, the civil war which Tito provoked in Siberia facilitated the work of the Germans. During the early fall of 1941 new Nazi divisions crushed both Serbian resistance forces with terrible cruelty, left towns and villages smoking ruins, and massacred civilians by the scores of thousands."

Although by 1939 there were at the most one-half million Communists, they were well organized and better equipped to attract aid from the Allies.

"The main motive of Tito and his Communist comrades in fighting the Germans was their hope that through fighting they would obtain control of the Yugoslav state. Their chief aim was political power. And Tito did not delay taking steps toward forming a country-wide political organization that would develop into a reorganization of the state. In fact, he and the other leading Communists began taking such steps long before the war broke out. As we retrace their activity we see that they moved toward their goal with great steadfastness and skill."

Regardless of the fact that Tito was about to obtain material aid from America and Britain, his attitude toward his former allies was described in 1946 by Markham as follows:

"No force in the western world since VE-day has shown itself so hostile to Britain and America as have Tito and his partisans. Although no statesman in the world did more to place Tito in power than Winston Churchill, excepting Stalin alone, Tito has treated Britain as a mortal enemy. In 1944 the British and Americans actually saved Tito personally from the Germans. For a long period they clothed, fed, and equipped his army. They maintained scores of thousands of Yugoslav women and children in Italy and Egypt. The British protected him with their fleet on the island of Vis. Yet at that very time Tito and his partisans defied the British. They openly offended the British in Italy, stirred up the Greek EAM against the British, encouraged the Albanian partisans to threaten the lives of British liaison officers. I write all this from personal knowledge. As the British and Americans were maintaining and training partisan armies in Africa and Italy, Tito surreptitiously left Vis and flew off to Moscow. His associates refused to let the British forces land on the Dalmatian coast, after the Allies had forced the Germans to evacuate it, and they seized practically all British property in Yugoslavia on the pretext that its owners had collaborated with the Germans. Rarely in its long history has Great Britain been so humiliated even by a great power as it was repeatedly insulted by Balkan partisans that were incited by Tito. And that hostility continues unabated.

"Toward America, Tito and his regime may be even more hostile, perhaps because America is more of a world factor. America is not only treated officially as an enemy but the Yugoslav Government appears to go out of its way to compromise, offend, and actually injure America. Tito acts as though he were serving as a light brigade, or an advance guard, for Soviet Russia in fighting the United States. He seems to be testing out how far he can wear America down or how much America will take. He seems to lead the shock troops of communism and Slavdom against the United States.

"For example, he kept a number of Americans as 'slave laborers' and long refused to give even civil attention to United States notes about them. It is true that this dispute was two-sided, because some of those Americans may have been of German origin with unfavorable war records, but Tito treated the United States Government, when protecting American citizens, as though he were dealing with an enemy, not an ally daily giving enormous aid to Yugoslavia.

"More flagrant than any of these things was the shooting down of two American planes and the killing of five American soldiers. There seems to be no doubt that this was done deliberately. It is true that Tito considered himself provoked. He charged America with air spying. But at that moment America was feeding literally millions of Yugoslavs. America was Tito's ally and we were all trying to make peace. Yet Tito's army deliberately killed Americans. It is difficult to interpret that shooting as anything but the act of a rash and irresponsible statesman, in whose hands Balkan peace is not safe. It may be that the Americans were technically at fault in touching Yugoslav air, but is there any conceivable justification of Tito's blotting out such Americans in time of peace? Tito is engaged in a kind of war with America—and a war of aggression."

And this attitude in 1947 was described in an oration by a prominent Czech Communist when he said: "Let the world know that our frontiers do not end at the eastern border. They extend from the Adriatic and the Bulgaro-Greek border over thousands and thousands of miles to the Pacific. These are our frontiers—the Slav frontiers. Within that territory live 250,000,000 Slavs who would defend our frontiers if anyone were to threaten them."

Markham concludes: "This grand and sweeping picture places Yugoslavia in a united Communist realm stretching from the Adriatic and northern Greece, across the Balkans, eastern Europe and Russia to Japan. That fact fixes Yugoslavia's place in contemporary history. In that grandiose, monolithic Slav world, Yugoslavia is a key outpost and a cornerstone.

"This opinion of a leading spokesman for world communism and for Slavdom regarding Yugoslav's alinement confirms what Tito himself and his leading comrades have said many times. Yugoslavia is a unit in a continent-spanning, world-threatening political system. With each passing month the cracks and seams in the Communist-dominated Slav monolith are being filled and smoothed by drastic purges and a general tightening of the Communist Party. During the month of May alone, Soviet Russia and its Communist affiliates announced 'reactionary plots' in every Communist-governed Balkan land, including Yugoslavia, and all the 'plots' resulted in police action against non-Communist leaders."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aiken	Holland	Murray
Anderson	Humphrey	Myers
Benton	Hunt	Neely
Brewster	Ives	Nixon
Bricker	Jenner	O'Conor
Bridges	Johnson, Colo.	O'Mahoney
Butler	Johnson, Tex.	Pastore
Byrd	Johnston, S. C.	Pepper
Capehart	Kem	Robertson
Carlson	Kerr	Russell
Chapman	Kilgore	Saltonstall
Chavez	Knowland	Schoeppel
Clements	Langer	Smith, Maine
Connally	Lehman	Smith, N. J.
Cordon	Long	Smith, N. C.
Donnell	Lucas	Stennis
Douglas	McCarran	Taft
Dworshak	McCarthy	Taylor
Eastland	McClellan	Thomas, Okla.
Ecton	McFarland	Thomas, Utah

Gurney	Malone	Watkins
Hayden	Martin	Wherry
Hendrickson	Maybank	Wiley
Hickenlooper	Millikin	Williams
Hill	Morse	Young
Hoey	Mundt

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the conference report on Senate bill 4234.

The report was agreed to.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX BILL MADE THE UNFINISHED BUSINESS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, out of order, I ask that Calendar Order 2676, the bill (H. R. 9827) to provide revenue by imposing a corporate excess-profits tax, and for other purposes, be made the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STENNIS in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I might add—and I think the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, will agree—that we shall not proceed to the consideration of this bill until tomorrow, at 12 o'clock, but that, after the convening of the Senate tomorrow, we shall immediately proceed to the consideration of this measure.

FARM-PRODUCT PRICES

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] is recognized.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my distinguished colleague may yield to me to make a statement lasting not more than 15 minutes; and I ask unanimous consent that it be understood that in doing so, my colleague will not jeopardize his right to the floor.

Mr. LANGER. I yield, providing there is that understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered; and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] is recognized.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, in this morning's Washington Post there appears an article entitled "Farm Lobby Cracks Price Law." The article is by Drew Pearson, and it reads, in part, as follows:

FARM LOBBY CRACKS PRICE LAW

(By Drew Pearson)

It looks as if the cost of certain key items isn't going to be controlled very soon, after all.

Price Administrator Mike Di Salle, who came to Washington prepared to do a job for the housewife, got a rude shock when he read the price-control law thoroughly. For the farm lobby had neatly inserted certain exceptions to price control, and one of them is grain. In brief, Di Salle has no power whatsoever to control the price of grain or any food made from grain.

So Di Salle will have to go back to Congress in January and get the law rewritten.

Aside from this, the new price czar—

And then the article goes on to refer to other matters.

Mr. President, that article is erroneous, deceiving, and misleading. I think it is designed primarily to make the farmer the goat again in the present price situation.

It leaves the impression that farm-commodity prices are unreasonably high and that they are exempt from price control.

I think a few facts should be called to the attention of the Senate. I have obtained comparative figures from the Department of Agriculture. They give a comparison between the parity-price situation as of November 15, 1950, and the parity-price situation as of a year before, as of November 15, 1949.

Let me say in passing that parity is based upon a Government formula which is designed to insure farmers of their fair share of the national income. In other words, when a farm commodity is selling at parity the farmer is only receiving for what he produces a price which has a fair relationship to that received by industry and labor for what they produce.

Mr. President, in the last year labor has received at least two rounds of wage increases, and about four rounds of wage increases since the war. During this same period farm prices have dropped by anywhere from 25 percent to as much as 50 percent, and more.

Let me read some comparative figures:

On November 15, 1949, wheat was selling at 90 percent of parity. Now, as of November 15, 1950, wheat was selling at 85 percent of parity. It is true that in the last week the price of wheat has risen some 5 or 6 cents a bushel or some 2 or 3 percent of parity.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I am glad to yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. Does the Senator desire to complete his statement before he yields?

Mr. YOUNG. I prefer to finish reading these comparative figures.

Mr. MAYBANK. Very well.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, a year ago, rye was selling at 73 percent of parity. As of November 15, 1950, it was selling at 75 percent of parity.

A year ago, corn was selling at 67 percent of parity; now it is selling at 83 percent of parity.

A year ago, oats were selling at 70 percent of parity; now they are selling at 82 percent of parity.

A year ago, barley was selling at 74 percent of parity; now it is selling at 75 percent of parity.

A year ago, grain sorghums were selling at 57 percent of parity; now they are selling at 60 percent of parity.

A year ago, hogs were selling at 90 percent of parity; now they are selling at 90 percent of parity.

A year ago, soybeans were selling at 85 percent of parity; now they are selling at 97 percent of parity.

A year ago, beef cattle were selling at 148 percent of parity; now beef cattle are selling at 140 percent of parity.

A year ago, veal calves were selling at 147 percent of parity; now they are selling at 141 percent of parity.

A year ago, lambs were selling at 152 percent of parity; now they are selling at 136 percent of parity.

A year ago, chickens were selling at 85 percent of parity; now they are selling at 75 percent of parity.

A year ago, turkeys were selling at 100 percent of parity; now they are selling at 86 percent of parity.

A year ago, eggs were selling at 77 percent of parity; as of November 15, 1950, they were selling at 74 percent of parity. Of course, in the case of eggs, since November 15 there has been a speculative market, when I think a few persons obtained a corner on the market; and the price went up unreasonably.

I am glad to yield now to the distinguished Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator's courtesy in yielding to me. I have asked him to yield for the reason that he talked to me this morning about the article to which he has referred, and we were talking about it in the Appropriations Committee. Other persons have called it to my attention.

One of the troubles seems to be, as the Senator from North Dakota has so ably stated, that if anything goes wrong, many persons want to blame the poor old farmer. There is no reason why anyone should undertake to blame the farmer and try to avoid responsibility for a law that we passed in September or October, and which should have been placed in force a long time ago. So I requested the staff of the Banking and Currency Committee to look into the law and the facts so that I would be certain of what I am about to state, with the kind permission of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. YOUNG. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from South Carolina for that purpose.

Mr. MAYBANK. The statement is as follows:

I intend no criticism of Mr. Pearson. He is reporting what some people, perhaps in high places, are saying. Actually a thorough study of the act and some knowledge of farm prices and agricultural production would reveal that the committee, not any lobby, unanimously agreed on the price-control provisions relating to agricultural commodities. These sections of the act, in effect, provide that price controls on farm commodities should be in fair relationship to the prices of other commodities and the prices existing during the period May 24 to June 24, 1950. It would be manifestly unfair, for example, to fix a price on a farm commodity at a price existing today, when that price had changed hardly at all over the last 6 months, while the prices of numerous other nonfarm commodities had moved up from 25 to 50 percent in some cases.

Let me comment here that the Senator from North Dakota has given the parity figures.

In view of the actual statistics on farm prices and nonfarm prices during the last 6 months, it appears that someone seems to be looking very hard for a scapegoat to blame for the current failure to control prices. Why all the concern about controlling grain prices at this moment, when the price of gain over the past 6 months has practically remained stationary?

Mr. President, I take my hat off to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota and to other Senators on his side of the aisle, who know more about grain than I do. All I know is what is shown by the statistics, and, further, that there is an effort to blame the farmer.

I repeat:

Why all the concern about controlling grain prices at this moment, when the price of grain over the past 6 months has practically remained stationary?

The statement continues:

On June 15 the price for wheat received by the farmer was $1.93. On November 15 it was $1.94. It is true that it has moved up slightly since that date. Is that the cause for all the concern—grain moves up a bit, and immediately all the blame for whatever failure there has been to control prices is put on the farm lobby?

How is it that no one bothers to point out that in June 1948, when wheat was selling for $2.81, a 1-pound loaf of bread was selling for 13.8 cents, while in October this year, when wheat had dropped to $1.91, the same loaf of bread was selling for 14.7 cents?

In other words, bread was selling for more than 1 cent higher, and wheat had gone down, as the Senator has said, by nearly $1 a bushel.

Who is reaping the profits out of inflation—the farmers or the distributors and the processors? On a 15-cent loaf of bread it is calculated that a wheat farmer receives only about 2½ cents.

The price of meat in October, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, was practically the same as it was in June. Corn on June 15 was selling for $1.36, and on November 15 it was selling for $1.37.

That refers, of course, to the price at the farms. The statement continues:

It is quite clear that the farmer during the last 6 months has been getting approximately the same price for his produce, but he has had to pay higher and higher prices for what he buys, and as soon as the prices move up a bit, because of the upward movement of nonagricultural prices—

And that is the parity formula to which the distinguished Senator from North Dakota was referring—the farmer and the farm lobby is held to be the chief scoundrel.

The act and the agricultural commodity price control provisions are the best and the fairest the committee could devise in the short time the committee had to act before the end of the last session. I would be the last one to say they are perfect. But I do say that if inflation has taken place, and it has, it is not because of the Defense Production Act, or because of the agricultural commodity price control provisions of the act.

I thank the Senator from North Dakota for having permitted me to read that statement.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, I should like to read a brief statement from a report of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture, issued last September. It is as follows:

The Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the Department of Agriculture reports that whereas in 1947 the wheat farmer received 3 cents out of a loaf of bread selling for 13 cents, his return in 1949 was only 2.4 cents from a loaf selling for 14½ cents.

In other words, when the price of wheat went down, the price of bread went up.

I should like to have the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, who is chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, which handled the price-control legislation, comment on this statement by Drew Pearson, if he will:

In brief, Di Salle has no power whatsoever to control the price of grain or any food made from grain.

I wonder whether that is a correct statement, in the opinion of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I do not desire to get into an argument with anyone, but I do want it distinctly understood that the Senate of the United States voted for the defense production bill, and it was my understanding that it was a fair bill, a bill that would be fair to business, fair to labor, and fair to the farmer. Whatever may be the reason for the current inflationary forces I see no reason to blame a farm lobby or farmers, for it has not been the prices of agricultural commodities that have gone up so much, but the prices of hundreds of other nonfarm commodities.

Mr. YOUNG. In other words, the stabilizer of prices can then control the prices of meat, which is derived from grain, as well as the price of bread and other commodities; is that correct?

Mr. MAYBANK. In my judgment, he can control whatever prices he wants to control.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I yield to the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. AIKEN. I may say to the distinguished Senator from North Dakota that the reason some people think that the price control administrator has no authority to control the prices of farm commodities, and particularly of grains, is that most commodities, and with but few exceptions, are still selling below the minimum price ceiling permitted by the law which was enacted last fall. So long as farm commodities are selling at low prices, prices out of proportion to those which prevail in the case of other commodities, the Price Administrator would have no authority to regulate the prices. But I believe that when the prices rise to the minimum ceilings permitted by the law, the Price Administrator would then have authority to prevent their getting out of line. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota whether that is not true?

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from North Dakota will yield, let me say that I agree with the statement of the Senator from Vermont, but, as I was saying to the Senator from North Dakota and as I now say to my good friend from Vermont, there is no good reason for anyone to say we cannot control the price of bread because we cannot control the price of wheat. The Senator knows that the price of wheat has gone up scarcely at all, though the price of bread has risen.

Mr. AIKEN. The Senator from South Carolina may be entirely correct about that, but the prices of farm commodities do not come under the jurisdiction of the stabilizer of prices until they reach the minimum levels, and many farm commodities are still selling so low that, contrary to public belief, they have not yet reached even the minimum limit.

Mr. MAYBANK. The distinguished Senator from Vermont, the former chairman of the committee, has stated the point correctly. Would it be fair to freeze an agricultural commodity price if it was much below parity?

Of course, the committee did not do such thing as to freeze or to suggest that the prices of commodities should be away below parity.

Mr. AIKEN. It is very obvious that other costs and profits entering into the picture are what the consumer finds so high. The price is still well below parity, but the cost of labor and transportation and, in many cases, margins of profit have risen so that consumer costs have become quite high, and there is a tendency, as usual, to blame the farmer for it.

Mr. MAYBANK. I think the Senator from Vermont will agree with me that the farmer has not received the benefit.

Mr. AIKEN. That is correct.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I yield.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, on the day on which the retail market in Washington quoted eggs at $1 and more in the Washington markets I called a produce buyer in central western Minnesota and asked him what he was paying for eggs on that day. He was purchasing approximately 90 percent of the eggs he was receiving directly from the producer and the other 10 percent came from some buyer of eggs. On that day eggs were 64 cents for the grade A variety, and the price had just risen because of the rise in the general market price in the eastern area of the United States. The price on that day was $1.04 a dozen in the Washington retail market. The price of the second grade of eggs in Minnesota was approximately 10 or 12 cents a dozen less, which would make the second grade of eggs about 52 cents a dozen. The smaller eggs were priced at betweeen 20 or 24 and 30 cents a dozen to the producer. They were small eggs, pullet eggs, and the so-called dirty eggs.

Mr. President, I went into a retail market in Washington, not in the downtown section, but in the outer edge of the city, and bought ordinary groceries, such as breakfast food, bread, and butter, and I remarked to the clerk, "My, these prices are high." He immediately said, "It is the farm price-support program that makes all foods higher in price."

I said, "Are you familiar with what the farm-support program does?" He said, "Yes. It freezes the prices at this high level."

I said, "How much has the farm-price support program affected the price of bread?"

He said, "Tremendously."

I said, "Young man, before you talk like this and confuse the poor housewife who buys groceries, you had better check on the law and find out what it requires and just how it does affect the commodities which the housewife buys for her necessary food."

The fact is, Mr. President—and the only reason I make mention of it is that in every food market reference is made to the price-support program as being the factor which has made the costs of food so high—there comes a time when we in Congress, as has been so ably done by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. YOUNG] and by the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee [Mr. MAYBANK] this afternoon, should shed light on the true facts in order that the housewife may have her fears somewhat allayed. It is not the farm program which is causing the higher food costs; it is oftentimes the excess profits which are taken, and it is a monopoly, rather than the farm price-support program which is causing it.

Mr. YOUNG. The Senator is correct. I do not know of a segment of our economy which has had more misinformation put out about it than have the farmers of this Nation. It is a pity that the people of this great Nation do not have more accurate information regarding its great agricultural economy. There are many sensational stories unfortunately carried in prominent magazines, most of which are not based on facts at all. That is the case with this Drew Pearson article and those of many other columnists.

Mr. President, I should like to read from the Bismarck Tribune of December 14, 1950, the cash grain quotations of that date as follows:

No. 1 wheat was selling at $2.02 a bushel. After the close of the war wheat was selling for something over $3 a bushel. That means a drop in price of a dollar a bushel.

Barley was selling for 93 cents a bushel. For months after World War II barley was selling at double that amount.

Oats were selling at 70 cents a bushel in Bismarck. After the war, for a year or more, the price was approximately double that amount.

Rye was selling on December 14, 1950, at $1.32 a bushel.

Flax was selling at $3.47; only 2 years ago it was about twice this price or more than $6 a bushel.

During the same period in which farm commodity prices have dropped, farm machinery costs went up 25 or 30 percent and more. The price of automobiles has gone up probably 25 percent or more. The price of gasoline, the price of clothing, and the price of everything which the farmer has to buy have increased. The farmer has taken the rap for 4 years in succession, and all these publications are bound to keep on giving this misinformation to the people of the United States.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. YOUNG. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. The farmers do not advertise in the newspapers and magazines, do they?

Mr. YOUNG. No; unfortunately, they do not. I have often wished that the farmers would spend a little money in presenting the true picture to the American public by way of radio programs and newspaper publicity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] has the floor.

In order to keep the RECORD straight, unanimous consent has been requested by the Senator from North Dakota that he be permitted to yield indefinitely to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. MCCARTHY] for the purpose of making a speech, without the Senator from North Dakota losing his right to the floor.

Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DAVID KARR AND DREW PEARSON

Mr. MCCARTHY. Mr. President, I have a file which I desire to insert in the RECORD today, containing photostats of the so-called Karr report, via the Executive Director and Chief Examiner of the Civil Service Commission, dated June 25, 1943. Before doing so, however, I should like to mention the fact that last week I discussed on the Senate floor the service being rendered to the Communist Party by a radio commentator named Pearson. I pointed out that his collaborator and the man through whom he receives orders and directions from the Communist Party is one David Karr, who was and is a very active and important member of the Communist Party.

Pearson, as was to be expected, immediately denied Karr's membership in the Communist Party. He made a statement to the effect that if Karr is a Communist, then the Washington Monument is a hole in the ground. Lest there be any doubt about this particular phase of the Pearson case, I am today reading into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the opinion rendered to the Civil Service Commission from the office of its Chief Examiner. That report should require no comment. Please keep in mind that this is one of those secret reports never supposed to come to the eyes of the American people. I assume Mr. Pearson did not know we had this report when he denied Mr. Karr's membership in the Communist Party.

I believe I fully covered a few days ago the important connection between David Karr and Drew Pearson. As I pointed out at that time, David Karr is the connecting link between Drew Pearson and the Communist Party. He is the man who assigns to Pearson the important task of conducting a character assassination of any man who dares to stand in the way of international communism.

As I pointed out the other day, the first major task which Pearson and his cabal had was to destroy Chiang Kai-shek. The next was to destroy Forrestal. The job now assigned to them is the destruction of Gen. Douglas MacArthur. They are doing that job with the same viciousness, degeneracy, and lack of adherence to the truth that he and his group have always folowed.

Let me read to the Senate the secret report of the Civil Service Commissioner at the time David Karr was working for the Government. Prior to that time he had been working in the Office of War Information, either under Mr. Lattimore, in the western portion, or under Mr. Joe Barnes, who was in the eastern portion. I do not know which. I think Senators are acquainted with the record of Lattimore. Mr. Joe Barnes also has been named as an active member of the party.

Subsequently Mr. Karr applied for a job as senior liaison officer, CAF–12, $4,600 a year, in the Office for Emergency Management.

I read from the report:

STATUS OF KARR CASE

Mr. David Karr was appointed senior liaison officer, CAF 12, $4,600, Office of Facts and Figures, Office for Emergency Management, February 5, 1942, subject to investigation.

Mr. Karr has no pending eligibilities or applications and his case has been returned without fingerprint clearance.

Investigation was conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation in March, April, May, and June, 1942.

I wish Senators would keep in mind that I am reading from the report of the Office of the Executive Director and Chief Examiner of the Civil Service Commission. I continue:

Additional investigation was conducted in April, 1943, by the Federal Bureau of Investigation, because Karr was the subject of complaints coming within the purview of Public Law 644, of the Seventy-seventh Congress. He was interviewed twice in connection with this investigation. The first time was on April 21, 1943, and again on May 10, 1943.

In his application, executed January 31, 1942, Mr. Karr stated he was born in New York City August 24, 1918, attended grammar school from 1924 to 1931; high school, 1931 to 1936; new school for social research from February 1937 to June 1937, and has been attending George Washington University since September 1941.

He lists his employments as February 1935 to January 1938 World-Telegram, reporter, paid by assignment on space basis, etc.; June 1937 to January 1938, New York Daily Mirror, reporter, paid by assignment on space basis, etc.; January 1938 to March 1938, salesman Fuller Brush Co.; November 1937 to January 1938, H. M. Manheim, office boy; April 1938 to January 1940, the Hour, investigator analyst, writer on foreign propaganda and subversive activities in the United States; August 1939 to present, Trans-Radio Press, reporter, rewrite desk man, and assistant to publisher.

David Karr has had considerable background experience as a newspaperman, doing investigative work. Thirty-five witnesses, including 12 FBI agents and confidential informants testified in this matter. Some of the witnesses expressed opinions favorable to Karr and others expressed opinions unfavorable. It is unnecessary to consider the opinion testimony, in view of the uncontroverted facts adduced in this case. The opinion testimony adds nothing to nor does it take anything from Mr. Karr's record of activities as either admitted by him or clearly proven by the testimony of FBI agents and informants.

The various FBI reports on David Karr are summarized as follows:

It must be kept in mind that this is not my summary. This is the summary from the Office of the Chief Examiner of the Civil Service Commission. I continue:

While working for the Fuller Brush Co. in and around New York, David Karr formed a close association with the Communist Party, joining it before he was hired by the Communist organ, the Daily Worker. The Daily Worker is the Communist paper which goes generally to all members of the Communist Party and whoever else cares to subscribe. Mr. Karr admitted to several FBI agents and informants that he was doing rewrite work for the party organizer.

I call attention particularly to this part:

The party organizer is the most confidential of all publications of the Communist Party. It is printed for and issued to only those who are high in the ranks of the party and it contains the latest instructions and decisions of the Communist Party.

That is the FBI analysis of this organ. I continue to quote:

Anyone doing rewrite work for the party organizer was of necessity a trusted and powerful member of the Communist Party. Mr. Karr had intimate contact with the high authorities of the Communist Party.

If I may stop quoting for a minute, I should like to call attention to this very important matter. Senators have in mind that if they wish to subscribe to the Daily Worker they can do so, and it will be sent to their home. However, no Senator may subscribe to the party organizer. According to the FBI report, that is the most confidential of all publications. It contains instructions to the top hierarchy of the Communist Party. Therefore, when a man is doing rewrite work for the party organizer, he is the last word on the directions and instructions going out in this top-secret publication to the members of the Communist Party. I am reading from the report of the chief examiner, saying that that was the task of Drew Pearson's chief collaborator, David Karr.

Going back to the report:

While he makes no mention of it in his application, Mr. Karr was doing work intermittently for the Daily Worker in 1937-38-39, at which time he was a member of the Communist Party. Each member of the staff of the Daily Worker had to be a member of the Communist Party. Mr. Karr also wrote articles for a magazine called Fight, which was published by the League for Peace and Democracy, which was heavily infiltrated and controlled by members of the Communist Party. Mr. Karr was also a member of the Mirror Unit of the Communist Party, at which time he informed an FBI undercover agent that he had inside tips on the Hearst organization, which he furnished to the party and that he wrote under another name when he wrote articles exposing the Hearst organization.

Mr. Karr was militantly and vociferously against United States intervention in the war until Hitler invaded Russia, after which time he adopted the party line and just as vociferously urged immediate United States intervention in the war.

David Karr was active in the formation of a victory council, sponsored by the Office of War Information. He succeeded in having a very heavy Communist representation on that council. He was also active in assisting the Communist Party to form a united front with several groups which the Communist Party had not in the past been successful in infiltrating and dominating.

The FBI reports also show that while working for the Daily Worker, David Karr freely admitted he was a member of the Communist Party. Mr. Karr was also connected with the Hour, which was headed by Albert E. Kahn, who was also a member of the Communist Party. The Hour had a very definite Communist background.

Mr. Karr wrote vigorous attacks upon the head of the Un-American Activities Committee, referring to the committee's work as "witch hunting" and "a danger to America." He referred to Congressman Dies as a "Witch-Finder General" and "the long-legged southern congressional rabble-rouser."

Mr. Karr did considerable lecturing along the Communist Party line, some of which was under the sponsorship of a Mr. Lowell Wakefield, a reporter for the Daily Worker, who was also a member of the Communist Party. He collaborated on a number of writing jobs with a Mr. Spivak, a well-known Communist writer, and with Mr. Wakefield.

When interviewed on July 14, 1942, David Karr stated that when he lost his job with the Daily Mirror he made contacts through the left wing section of the Newspaper Guild and Lowell Wakefield, a Communist reporter of the Daily Worker, who introduced him to a Mr. Spivak, a well-known Communist writer, and that the three of them "did a number of jobs together"; that Wakefield hired him to write articles, among them one on Martin Dies, head of the Un-American Activities Committee.

That, incidentally, is not Larry Spivak, of Mercury.

These are the admissions of Mr. Karr when he was interviewed:

This article was very critical of Congressman Dies. He stated that he was not a member of the Communist Party or the Young Communist League. He claimed that he wrote expositions of the Communist movement in this country, but when asked to produce the same was unable to do so. He admitted having attended meetings of the Young Communist League, but stated he attended less than half a dozen. He also admitted attending meetings of the Communist Party, but stated he did not attend as a member, but as a reporter of the Daily Worker.

I suggest to members of the press who are not members of the Communist Party—and that includes all I can see present, I believe—that they try to attend a meeting of the Communist Party as reporters, and see where they get.

He further admitted that he had lectured at meetings of the League for Peace and Democracy and that he knew it was Communist controlled and also that he had written for the league's magazine Fight. He stated that the League for Peace and Democracy invited him to become public relations director, but he did not take the job.

This is the conclusion of the chief examiner:

On the entire record, it is concluded that the activities, affiliations, and associations of David Karr, as shown by the Federal Bureau of Investigation's reports and the Commission's hearings, are communistic, and a finding of ineligible is considered necessary in this case. It is recommended, therefore, that Mr. David Karr be rated ineligible for the position of senior liaison officer; that he be barred for the duration; and that his immediate removal from the service be requested.

The date of this report is June 25, 1943.

Mr. President, I should also like to quote from the testimony before a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, of Howard C. Rushmore, who is presently on the editorial staff of the New York Journal American. I may say that to the best of my knowledge Mr. Rushmore is one of the most truthful witnesses with whom I have had contact. Rushmore testified that he had been on the staff of the Daily Worker, which is the official organ of the Communist Party. He also testified that he had been a member of the Communist Party for 3 years, from 1937 to 1939, inclusive, and that prior to that time he had been a member of the Young Communist League; that while a member of the Young Communist League he was managing editor of their publication, known as the Young Worker.

On page 798 of the hearings, Rushmore testified as follows:

Question. Does the name, Dave Katz, mean anything to you?

Answer. I knew a person by the name of Dave Katz when I was on the Daily Worker. In fact, I used to give him assignments. He, at that time, was working on one of the New York non-Communist papers and he had to show me his party card to get these assignments. Anyone working for the Worker, even on that basis, had to be a member of the Communist Party. I believe that Katz later became a leg man, as we say, or a reporter, for Drew Pearson. At the time I knew him he was a Communist.

Question. What name does he go under now? Do you know that?

Answer. I believe he uses the name of Karr.

Last week in discussing the extent to which the voice of this political terrorist and character assassin, Pearson, has been damaging America and helping the Communist cause, I pointed out that the Adam Hat Co. is presently responsible for poisoning the air waves with this voice of international communism; that the Adam Hat Co. is responsible for poisoning the well of information from which the families of millions of Americans drink. The Adam Hat Co. made an unusual answer. They said, "We are paying him, keeping him on the air, bringing him into millions of homes, but we are not responsible for what he says."

That defense is, of course, ridiculous to the point of being ludicrous. It is about the same as paying for huge ads in the Communist Daily Worker and having it sent into every American home, then saying: "Oh, but we are not responsible for what this Communist paper says."

The American people will not be fooled by this phony, senseless excuse. The truth is that Drew Pearson, under the directions of David Karr, of the Communist Party, would not be pouring his poison into millions of American homes every Sunday, if the Adam Hat Co. did not hire him and pay him to do it. He is in their employ. They do not have to hire the Karr-Pearson voice of communism; they could hire some voices of and for America.

The Adam Hat Co. might well take a lesson from the Canadian legal profession, which recently barred Communists from their legal organization on the basis that the Reds were unfit company for decent men and women. They did not want Communists or their propaganda peddlers representing them.

There is an old American saying to the effect that an honest, independent citizen never wears another man's hat. We should remember this today and refuse to touch anything stained with the Soviet foulness that comes from Pearson and Karr. These two are the grease-monkeys of the Communist conspiracy that is trying to conquer us. Everything they touch is smeared with the filth of their hands. The blackness of their lies is mixed with the blood shed by American boys, who are the real victims of the Communist conspiracy which Pearson and Karr continuously promote in America—bought and paid for by the Adam Hat Co.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. ANDERSON. Since at the conclusion of the address of the junior Senator from Wisconsin last week I had a word or two to say about David Karr, I desire to say a word now, not with the intention of trying to engage in controversy, but solely to explain that Mr. Karr's name came before a select committee of the House of Representatives chosen from the membership of the Appropriations Committee. The House of Representatives was steadily being torn to pieces by Members rising every time an appropriation bill was about to pass and moving that no part of the funds appropriated by the bill should be used to pay the salaries of certain persons, and then reading a full list of those whom the Dies Committee had charged, in the particular division of government whose appropriation was being considered, with being Communist sympathizers or members of the Communist Party. There would be a long argument about it, and the House was unable to transact business.

The problem was solved, I think to the satisfaction of the House, by the suggestion that the then chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. CANNON] of Missouri, and the ranking Republican member [Mr. TABER] of New York, select five Members in whom they both had confidence, and empower those five men to conduct an investigation of the charges to see if there were names which should be stricken from the payroll. Judge Kerr of North Carolina was selected as chairman of that committee, and I was selected as one of its members. We certified to the House of Representatives the names of certain persons who we felt ought to be left off Federal payrolls. In addition to that, suggestions were made to members of various departments. While the record was not particularly clear in certain cases, it was of a nature that would certainly indicate that the person might very well not be employed.

I must say that in the case of David Karr nothing like the testimony which the Senator read to the Senate was presented to the committee by the FBI. There was nothing that I saw—and I believe my memory is reasonably good—in the FBI report that even approximately approaches what has just been read.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a minute?

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes.

Mr. McCARTHY. If the Senator from New Mexico had had in his possession the photostats which I will be glad to hand him, photostats of the recommendation of the chief examiner for the Civil Service Commission; if he had had before him the testimony which is set forth in this report which I hold in my hand—a report, the Senator understands, not prepared by McCARTHY, but prepared in the office of the chief examiner of the Civil Service Commission, then certainly he would have recommended that David Karr's name be removed from any Federal payroll, and that he be removed from any Federal job? Am I correct?

Mr. ANDERSON. No, not necessarily because——

Mr. McCARTHY. Oh, well, then——

Mr. ANDERSON. Let me explain that, if I may. In every FBI report I saw there were both sides of every question. There would be one line of witnesses who almost without exception would say that they saw this man going in and out of Communist meetings. "We have seen him steadily engaged in this sort of activity." Then further along would be a long series of careful investigations by the FBI pointing out that there was in their opinion no truth in the charge that he had been a member of the Communist Party. I am not trying to say that there was anything of that nature in the file of David Karr, because I recall nothing of that nature. I merely point out that with all this information in front of the members of the committee, David Karr was subsequently certified as eligible for Federal employment.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. ANDERSON. After I finish one brief statement.

I am trying to explain to the junior Senator from Wisconsin that I am not endeavoring to discuss the controversy at issue. I do not know the facts at this late date. I went over the Karr case in 1943 or 1944. I went carefully into a great many cases and at that time read files long into the night for weeks and months at a time, and I make no pretense to being able to remember what was in every file.

Mr. McCARTHY. May I ask the Senator from New Mexico this question? If he had had before him at that time this report in which appears the fact that Karr admitted to a man within the Bureau, first, that he worked for the Daily Worker—and it must be remembered that in order for one to work for the Daily Worker he must be a Communist; second, that he worked for the party organizer as a rewrite man; if the Senator had had before him the report which shows that Karr admitted that he had attended meetings of the Communist Party; that he had joined the Young Communist League; that he had admitted considerable lecturing along the Communist Party line, some of which was under the sponsorship of Lowell Wakefield, and had collaborated on a number of writing jobs with Mr. Spivak, both well-known Communist writers; if the Senator were to find that Karr had admitted having been given the task of smearing Martin Dies, head of the Un-American Activities Committee—if the Senator knew he had admitted all that, would not the Senator have believed that this man, regardless of how many persons said he was a nice young man, under no circumstances was qualified to work for this Government?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, I did not so understand the testimony that was read. I thought it was a statement by an examiner of the Civil Service Commission that one FBI agent had testified that he had received certain information. I should want to read the whole file before passing judgment on it. That is all I say. And when one reads the whole file one may get another impression.

For example, this is close to Christmas, and I know everyone would like to do something nice for the American Red Cross. Mr. David Karr has addressed to me a letter under date of December 18, thanking me for the few brief words I put into the RECORD, and then says with reference to the charges made against him: "(1) I will pay $10,000 to the American Red Cross, or any other charity he"—meaning the Senator from Wisconsin—"designates, if he can prove I was ever on the staff of the Daily Worker for 2 minutes, let alone 2 years."

I think there is a chance to pick up $10,000 of easy money for the American Red Cross, and so far as I am concerned, that would clear up the situation.

Mr. McCARTHY. May I ask the Senator from New Mexico, would it satisfy him if he knew that Karr worked for the Daily Worker? Would it satisfy the Senator if we had Karr's employer, Howard C. Rushmore, come over here and swear under oath, as he has, that he employed Karr, "and I could not have employed him unless I had seen his party card"? Would it satisfy the Senator if in addition to that the Senator had in his hand page 5 of this secret report in which it appears that when interviewed by the Civil Service Commission on July 14, 1942, Mr. Karr admitted that he was a reporter, that he worked for the Daily Worker, and admitted that he attended Communist meetings? He, of course, said he was not a member of the party; that he merely went to the meetings as a reporter, but he admitted that he attended meetings of the Young Communist League. Would it satisfy the Senator if in addition to that he had in his hands reports to the effect that Karr admitted that he was a rewrite man for the party organizer? Is there anything further I can do to qualify the Red Cross for that $10,000? Must I have his picture receiving the party card——

Mr. ANDERSON. No.

Mr. McCARTHY. What more can we show than his own admission to the Chief Examiner of the Civil Service Commission that he is a Communist? He is not only a Communist but he is high in the Communist Party organization. I ask the Senator what more proof I can give him?

Mr. ANDERSON. I tried to answer that; that is to see all the evidence, when the FBI file is not here, sir. The Civil Service file is not here. If all the FBI file or all the Civil Service file were here, that would reveal why the Civil Service Commission listed him eligible for Federal employment. That is what I am trying to say.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one more question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I am glad to. First, I will say I have tried my very best to state that this is a matter upon which, some years ago, I spent weeks and months, to the detriment of my health, and I do not intend to spend additional weeks and months upon it to the detriment of my health. I only was trying to explain how it was possible for a group in the House of Representatives, presented with certain information, to decide that there was nothing quite so bad about this young man as had been represented by witnesses. I am not trying to go into all the material the Senator from Wisconsin presents. I am not going to be qualified to pass upon it, and I do not desire to pass upon it. I only say that every time one of these cases came in I spent hours trying to study the information, and the only cases that we certified—we would have certified more of them if the matter had continued—were the Dodd, Watson, and Lovett cases. Now it comes down to some very fine hair lines. I admit that the line between Goodwin and Frederick Schumann was very close. Yes, the committee, Republicans and Democrats alike, cleared Frederick Schumann by unanimous vote and we condemned Goodwin Watson by unanimous vote, Republican and Democrats alike.

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for two more questions?

Mr. ANDERSON. I yield.

Mr. McCARTHY. First with relation to Frederick Schumann. Was the Senator aware at the time he cleared Frederick Schumann that Frederick Schumann had belonged to 35 organizations which had been officially labeled either by the Attorney General or by a congressional committee as front-support organizations doing the work of the Communist Party? Was the Senator aware of that, No. 1? And, No. 2——

Mr. ANDERSON. Yes; and not only was I aware of that, but the Republican members of the committee were aware of it when the matter was presented to the leading members of the Republican Party of the House of Representatives, including JOHN TABER, who is as far from the Communists as anybody could ever be. I was aware of it.

Mr. McCARTHY. One more question. The Senator is talking about this investigation of Karr. Did the Senator ever see the complete FBI files on David Karr?

Mr. ANDERSON. I think not.

Mr. President, I have read through the letter from David Karr to me. I do not think it says anything in an unkind fashion toward the junior Senator from Wisconsin. If it had, I would not want it printed in the RECORD, because I do not think it is proper so to use the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the letter printed in the RECORD at this point. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that if there is anything in it which he thinks in any way is a reflection on him, I want that taken out, because I do not wish to use the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a medium of talking about my fellow Members of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McCARTHY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, although I shall not do so, let me say to the Senator that I have been called rather descriptive names on the floor of the Senate. If one or two more are added in that letter, they will not bother me at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y., December 18, 1950.

Hon. CLINTON P. ANDERSON,
United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I have noted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD your gracious reply to Senator MCCARTHY's statements concerning me. I well recall the fair-minded way in which you disposed of these charges after careful investigation by the Kerr committee, of which you were a member in 1943. At that time, every statement now reechoed by the Senator from Wisconsin was fully answered. As I recall it, the full records of the Un-American Activities Committee, the FBI, and the Civil Service Commission were placed at your disposal. The full security clearance you gave me further stimulated my eagerness to work for the democratic process.

As to the Senator from Wisconsin's rehash:

(1) I will pay $10,000 to the American Red Cross, or any other charity he designates, if he can prove I was ever on the staff of the Daily Worker for 2 minutes, let alone 2 years.

(2) In 1938 I wrote a number of articles on Nazi activities in the United States. As a free-lance writer I sold these wherever I could. Several appeared in The Fight and several in Equality. They attacked the German-American Bund and the Ku Klux Klan. As I recall it, a number of prominent writers, including Members of Congress, Dorothy Thompson, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, and many others wrote for these magazines at the same time. It was not until several years later that it was revealed that these magazines had been converted into Communist-controlled fronts. I had long since severed my association with them.

On Friday, I challenged Senator MCCARTHY to repeat his charges off the floor without immunity so that they could be tested in the courts. It seems to me that an attempt to hash over these discredited charges, item by item, in these critical days is a waste of the United States Senate's valuable time. As for my own situation, I believe it would best be handled in the courts. The greatest service that could be done for me at this time, while at the same time serving the best interests of the Senate and the Nation, would be to get MCCARTHY to meet me in court.

Very sincerely yours,

DAVID KARR.

THE DENAZIFICATION PROGRAM

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon I went fully into the proposition that the situation in Europe is much worse than the situation in Asia, and much more dangerous to the people of the United States. I base that statement upon the investigation I made personally when I went abroad with groups associated with the military or with some of the Government departments.

In my remarks yesterday I took up the matter of denazification. I showed how, following the war, under the American policy, every engineer, every scientist, and every school teacher was barred from employment in the American zone. I showed how Russia promptly hired them. I said that at that time the feeling of the German people was that they wanted nothing to do with rearmament, chiefly because of the difference between the way they were treated at the end of the war by the United States and the way they were treated at that time by the Russians. I showed that when the American troops entered Germany, they were hailed by the German people as their liberators and their friends, but thereafter the German people were amazed at the treatment they received.

At this time I particularly wish to take up the matter of denazification. Again I wish to make it plain that I am not talking about the first trial, where Goering and the other leaders were tried, because they were tried by an Allied court. I am referring to the millions of German people who were tried by American courts, with American prosecutors, under laws written by Americans.

Yesterday, in the course of my remarks, I made it plain that those laws were ex post facto laws. I shall take a few minutes today to inform the Senate of the attitude of the German people in regard to that denazification program.

Among the policies which have damaged the interests of the United States, the denazification program is in my opinion the very worst. Instead of limiting denazification to the active and evil participants and beneficiaries of the Nazi movement, we indiscriminatedly penalized every German, whether his membership was active or merely nominal. In other words, during the Nazi regime, if a child wanted to go to school, that child had to join the Nazi Party.

If denazification had been used for the proper purpose—that is, to free the German people from the spirit of injustice and ruthless power—it would have served to reconstruct good will for us in Germany. It must be borne in mind that there were many opponents of Hitler, that many men had suffered and died for their opposition to Hitler. The emigrants in New York, who from a safe distance denounced the cruelty and injustices of the Nazis, were not their only opponents. There were many decent and courageous men who remained in Germany and did what they could to oppose. These men welcomed the entry into Germany of the Americans. They welcomed our troops as friends, as liberators. They were men of justice and good will who did not want to see hate and injustice of the victors replace the hate and injustice of the Nazis. These men approved denazification in principle as a desirable goal; but they deplored denazification as practiced, because they saw that it was accomplishing the very opposite of what was intended. They saw that the law was in error, that it was written in a spirit of hate and revenge by persons who were interested in paying off personal scores, rather than in reconstructing German society. These men deplored the broad basis of the law as a result of which about one-third of all German adults were made criminals, directly or indirectly affected by the law.

Mr. President, at this time I wish to call attention again to the fact that a number of Communists, some of whom had worked in the United States for the Daily Worker, and belonged to the Communist Party in the United States, simply changed their names and were put on the payroll of the United States Government as persecutors and prosecutors in some of those trials.

In my remarks on yesterday, I referred to my resolution calling for the production of the payrolls in order to make it possible to show what men received pay from the United States Government for their work in the denazification program. I wish to have the payrolls produced before the committee, so that it can ascertain how many of those men were Communists and were working for Joe Stalin, in an attempt to discredit our Government in Western Germany.

I repeat, Mr. President, that under the denazification law about one-third of all German adults were made criminals, and either directly or indirectly were affected by that law.

The law included a presumption-of-guilt provision, which automatically resulted in having the accused immediately barred from his usual line of work, in addition to other serious consequences. Of course, the law also included an invention of the Kremlin, which makes persons liable for opinions and acts at a time when they were not forbidden. Although the western civilized nations had wisely forbidden ex post facto laws, the zealots responsible for the denazification program included such a provision. Thus, these newly made citizens, most of them of German origin, now saw a chance for revenge and the exercise of hate. All that was done in the name of America, for the purposes of teaching democracy to the Germans. Denazification was planned and carried out by the same leftist group here in Washington and in Germany which invented the Morgenthau plan. In Germany the program was carried out chiefly by Communists whom the United States had put in power. Those Communists openly boasted that denazification was intended as a means of changing property ownership. For that purpose they even instituted denazification proceedings against men who had died years before. Of course, only "dead Nazis" who had left some property were subject to denazification proceedings. The dead men could easily be found guilty, and the property they had left could be taken as a fine. Nazis who had died poor were left in peace.

Denazification proved a perfect measure for enlarging the political power of the Communist Party in Germany. Remember, Mr. President, that our military government made the Communist Party legal, in addition to placing many Communists in good Government jobs. Every denazification board had at least one Communist Party member.

That is the way America has acted over there. Now the German people are being called upon to be willing to fight. It is any wonder that in the elections held 3 weeks ago last Sunday in Württemberg, Baden, and Hesse, and in the election held a week ago in Bavaria, the German Social Democrats won by overwhelming majorities.

Former Nazis, whether nominal or active members, were approached and told that they would have no trouble—if they joined the Communist Party. Men holding small jobs, who had been compelled to become Nazi Party members merely to hold their jobs, were forced to become Communists, again merely so that they could hold their jobs. Little men, plain workers of the railroads, and so forth, were ousted from their work automatically because they had been party members, only to see to their chagrin that their boss who had made them join the Nazi Party was now still on the job, because—through pull, or otherwise—he could prove he had never been an active Nazi. Graft was rampant. The poor, if they did not join the Communist Party, had to pay a fine and were suspended from their regular work for varying periods, while those who could pay enough had their cases postponed and, after sufficient delay, they were quietly dropped or dismissed with very light penalties.

All German doctors, lawyers, teachers, and professional men necessarily belonged to professional groups, just as our lawyers and doctors belong to bar and medical associations. All such associations were automatically taken over by the Nazis. Thus doctors, lawyers, teachers, and other professional men automatically became nominal party members without being asked whether they liked it or not. The denazification law automatically barred these men from their work. They had to support their families as common laborers, if they were lucky enough not to be arrested. Thus we find those scientists and school teachers in the American zone of occupation digging ditches.

Our bright boys responsible for this program also had invented automatic arrest. This means that anyone accused would automatically be arrested and would then be held for varying length of time in prison or detention camps, until he could find out why he was arrested, and perhaps disprove the charge. Some men were held for as long as 2 years. In one case a woman teacher was arrested, held in prison for 6 months, and then released with the statement written on her discharge, "promoted during Nazi regime," as the reason for her detention. Collective guilt was the rule.

The very people who now complain about guilt by association under our new Security Act were the ones who approved guilt by association when they had the power in Germany. It mattered little why anyone had joined the party. All were put in the same class, and all were penalized. Lawyers who returned after 4 and 5 years service in the army were, upon discharge as prisoners of war, arrested as former Nazis, forbidden to engage in legal practice, and otherwise humiliated. Is it any wonder that these men today say "No" when we ask them to again take arms for the defense of the west? Scientists were barred from their jobs. Their families hungered. Their funds, if they had any, were blocked. They were ousted from their homes. While this was going on, the Russians opened research projects, offered well-paid jobs to these unemployed scientists, and gave them extra food packages. It must be borne in mind that in those days we were anxious to get on our side scientists who might contribute, or have knowledge of subjects related, to the atomic bomb. We all remember that our atomic bomb project was very secret.

Yet here our zealots were driving to the Russian side the very scientists who could have worked for us.

While we were teaching the American way of life to the defeated Germans and asking them to learn better ways from our lectures, we were imprisoning Germans merely for their opinions, and this was done by men who were at the same time preaching the superiority of a country which makes freedom of opinion one of its basic principles. These men were accused of crimes which were never crimes when committed. They were told that having joined the party was a crime. Over here, as part of our war program, we compelled every working man to join a labor union. Over there we penalized German workers because they had belonged to the German labor front, the one big labor union to which all German workers were compelled to belong. And then we committed the crowning injustice of enacting ex post facto laws in the name of democracy, though our Constitution expressly forbids ex post facto laws.

Why was all this done? It was done as part of a deliberate policy to prevent the Germans from becoming too friendly to the Americans, so that the Germans might not some day fight alongside the Americans against the Russians. All these apparent mistakes were not mistakes. They were part and parcel of a plan to create a gulf between the decent Germans and the Americans. It was done by a crowd of leftist refugees and pro-Communists, who had obtained important positions in Washington. The program was planned and carried out by our intellectual leftists. That is why they so enthusiastically approved it in the press and so strenuously objected when suggestions were made to modify the severity of the denazification program. That demand was made upon this floor time and time again, and, therefore, I believe every Senator ought to be interested in the adoption of an appropriate resolution and in an investigation being made, so that the names of the Communists and pro-Communists who are on the payroll of the Federal Government, and who were for Russia, may be obtained.

Back of this program were the open Communists, such as Gerhard Eisler, who with many similarly minded men had been rescued by the United States in 1940 from French concentration camps, to keep them from being captured by the advancing German Army. These men had been given political asylum by the United States. While American boys were dying to recapture the lands occupied by the Nazis, these Communists worked out programs calculated to favor Russia and to harm the United States. After they returned to Germany they were welcomed with open arms by the Russians, and immediately given important positions in the Russian Zone, from which they openly worked against the United States. The Communists were well aware that they could not openly spread their doctrines and advocate their policies in the United States if they wished to succeed. They therefore infiltrated our intellectual groups with various Communist-front organizations, through which they spread their theories. Our duped intellectuals were allowed to believe that the ideas were theirs. In fact, the Communists were pulling the strings.

Denazification had a legitimate purpose, and would have been a good thing if it had been confined to its original purpose. But, as happened in the case of many other programs which had a good purpose, the Communists managed to infiltrate and to pervert the programs; so that they benefited Moscow but not the United States. Of course the American taxpayer was allowed to pay the bill.

DISMANTLING AND REARMAMENT

In this connection, Mr. President, I desire to take up, as a part of the subject, the mismanagement of the rearmament program.

While the American taxpayer is asked to finance the development of backward areas under the point 4 program, England, the largest beneficiary of Marshall plan funds, is creating a gigantic backward area in the very heart of Europe. The point 4 program is supposed to block communism. Yet at Salzgitter, in central Germany, the policies pursued by England advance communism. There, in an area as large as New York City, some 50,000 men are now unemployed because the steel plant where they formerly had jobs has been destroyed by the British, and the machinery which could have supplied steel for our rearmament has been delivered to the Russians.

This plant is located near Hannover, 15 miles from the iron curtain. It was erected during 1938–44 to exploit large deposits of low-grade iron ores, which, until then, it had been impossible to work economically. Mr. Brassert, an American engineer, born in England, had constructed in England steel plants which economically used low-grade iron ores found in England. The Germans asked Brassert to build similar plants for them to exploit the German low-grade iron ores. Brassert, worried lest the English might object, consulted Prime Minister Chamberlain. Chamberlain thought it would be a very good idea to use German labor and material for such peaceful construction, and thus avoid their use for armaments. Chamberlain urged Brassert to construct the plant on a gigantic scale. Despite the repeated objections of the German generals that this building project was consuming steel urgently needed to build tanks, the plant was built, and the building continued throughout the war. When the plant was finished in 1944 it was the most modern, efficient, and integrated steel plant in Europe, if not in the world, capable of producing 500,000 tons of steel annually. Modern towns were built to accommodate 50,000 workers with their families, with a garden to each family. A new industrial area destined to equal the Ruhr was being developed. The gas from the coke ovens was sold to cities as far away as Berlin. The heat and coal dust from the iron smelters and blast furnaces was piped under boilers to drive generators capable of supplying the plants and 250,000 inhabitants with electricity.

This plant, constructed to utilize all technical advances and to avoid waste, no longer exists. The coke ovens have been dynamited. Of the eight blast furnaces, the most modern in the world, all but two have been razed. The rolling mills have been dismantled and delivered to the Russians. The very foundations of the buildings have been blown up so that it is impossible for other industries to use the buildings and employ the now jobless former workers. Yet our allies repeatedly have asserted that buildings which could be used for other peaceful purposes would be allowed to remain, and that in carrying out this dismantling program care would be taken that no unemployment would result.

Of course the Russians have seen their opportunity and are taking advantage of this Allied stupidity. To the skilled men thrown out of work by the destruction of this plant they have offered jobs at good pay, in steel mills erected behind the iron curtain, with the very materials and machines taken from this dismantled plant. The unskilled workers remain in the area, a burden on the state, drawing unemployment subsistence, and ready listeners to the constant radio propaganda directed at them from the Russian zone which tells them that they are without jobs and their children hungry because Anglo-American capitalists were afraid of the competition of this new, most efficient steel plant. Their children are invited for a month's vacation in country resorts behind the iron curtain, free of cost, where the children are given new clothes, are well fed and entertained, and of course propagandized against the west. Each month a new group of children were thus invited and indoctrinated. Meanwhile we spent millions on a Voice of America program to wean the satellites away from the Russians.

Is it any wonder that some of the unemployed in the Salzgitter area demanded a plebiscite for the purpose of voting on the question of joining the Salzgitter area to the Russian zone of Germany? The Russians construct steel plants while we dismantle them and make men unemployed. Children graduating from school have no plants in which they can learn a trade. Again the Russians profit from our mistakes by offering them jobs and apprentice opportunities in their zone.

I invite the attention of Senators to a recent issue of the New York Times which states that in the three elections I have named some people refused to go to the polls and vote.

Those responsible for dismantling repeatedly assured the world that plants which had no military value and which were not on the dismantling list would not be destroyed. That promise likewise is not being kept. At Salzgitter, but not part of the steel works, is an experimental pilot plant for concentrating the poorest grade iron ore by a sintering process. The plant has demonstrated that very low-grade ores can be commercially utilized. It is the only such plant in Europe, and perhaps in the world. It is known as the Krupp-Rennanlage. This plant was inventoried as part of the steel plant, although it is an experimental plant and was never part of the steel works. This plant also is to be destroyed. The British awarded it as reparations to Greece. The Greeks have no use for it, and therefore offered to trade the plant for locomotives and heavy machinery. The Germans were willing to make this trade. But our friends, the British, have refused to give their consent on the ground that the plant has been awarded to other countries. Meanwhile Uncle Sam is asked to supply more money to Europe—to keep Europe from becoming Communist.

When asked for an explanation, the British had many, all of which could readily be refuted. They finally pointed out the window to the nearby Harz mountain and said: "Over there 18 miles away are the Russians." Yet a rolling mill identical with the one destroyed at Salzgitter has been constructed in a steel mill at Linz, Austria, on the shores of the Danube, where the Russians are right across the river. Of course the American taxpayer has paid for this new plant in Linz.

Mr. President, I went over there. There is a dam there, and on the other side of the river, in the hills, the Russians control the situation by their guns, less than 100 yards away. The ECA is spending $12,000,000 of American money to establish a first-class armament plant there. I said to the assistant manager, "How long would it take, in case of war, for the Russians to take this plant?" He said, "They could take it in 15 minutes." On one side of the dam we are spending an enormous amount of money to build this great plant, and less than 100 yards away is the Russian zone, with Russian guns trained on the plant.

Today there is a shortage of steel. The Fair Dealers tell us that our industrialists were negligent; that they had not expanded steel production enough. Yet these same critics are responsible for the destruction of this 500,000-ton steel capacity in the heart of Europe, and for the creation there of a devastated area.

Other examples of this stupidity could be supplied. Such as, for instance, the destruction in Dortmund, recently, of gigantic forge hammers of 2,000 tons weight made in 1943–44. These hammers were most modern and are vitally needed for the forging of huge pieces of metal. New ones will have to be constructed if Germany is to help in the rearmament program. Of course, ECA dollars will be required to pay for the work.

New forge hammers will probably cost close to $800,000. The value of the destroyed forges as scrap, when sent to England, was $30,000. This sort of démontage is still continuing. That the policy is based on economic and not military reasons is clear from the situation at the Henrichs plant in Hattingen. There after great effort it was possible to save from dismantling a 6,000-ton forge. It is now the largest in Germany, after a 15,000-ton forge at the Krupp plant and a 10,000-ton forge in another plant were dismantled. This forge is now used for making urgently needed large forged pieces, which were formerly made cheaper and better by the dismantled larger forges. Such needed pieces are practically always made from electro-steel. For this reason the Germans asked the British to remove from the dismantling list one of the two electric ovens at Hattingen. The British refused. Yet two other electro ovens, located far away, which were built expressly for war purposes, were not put on the dismantling list. Since the ovens are miles away from the forges, they cannot, of course, be used economically. That is the reason why the British dismantled the one and let the others stand while posing to the world as generous, considerate victors. In reality, they are motivated by competitive reasons only, and, of course, the American taxpayer is allowed to pay the bill. Another electro oven at Hattingen of 40 tons capacity has been offered to France, Norway, Yugoslavia as reparations. None had any use for it and rejected it. Despite this, the British insist that it be dismantled. And I repeat, this at the very time when the world is short of steel.

The advocates of the point 4 program tell us that it will prevent the spread of communism; that as we industrialize other countries we raise their standard of living and create additional markets for our products, thus contributing to the stabilization of the world. Yet our allies in Europe and the fellow travelers in military government have done everything in their power to destroy, under the guise of demilitarization, and to prevent the modernization and reconstruction of German industry, thus obviously furthering the growth of communism in Germany.

The policies which have resulted in these economic stupidities all were fixed by the Morgenthau-minded men who first had power in our occupation forces. Even though we no longer officially approve of the Morgenthau plan, many of the men who were Morgenthau-minded are still in positions where they control the economic policies in Europe. In the English zone crippling of a competitor, plus socialistic policies of the labor government have been responsible. In our zone the fellow travelers and the outright Communists, such as Harry White, and Alger Hiss, and their like have been responsible.

The result of all this is that Germany has been effectively crippled, and the American taxpayer has been compelled to make up the deficit via the Marshall plan. The same minds who are responsible for this destructive policy also are responsible for the Potsdam agreement which forbids the Germans to make military equipment. We need today precision instruments. There is a shortage of skilled labor in the United States. Many of the items which our Army needs could be made by German plants and men who are now idle. Potsdam forbids them from helping us. The Russians, of course, have not bothered about Potsdam. They used this skilled labor. They offer good pay while we offer them the dole. The Askania Werke in Berlin, world famous for its scientific and precision instruments, have over 1,000 skilled men now idle who are ready, able, and willing to make instruments required by our Armed Forces, if only we will allow them to do it. It is high time that our restrictions be removed and that these men be allowed to help in our armament program.

Mr. President, that brings me to the Security Act of 1950.

SECURITY ACT OF 1950

In my trip abroad I found that the Security Act of 1950 which we enacted to combat communism has, at least as far as Germany is concerned, the opposite effect. I am not quite sure whether the difficulties are due entirely to the act. I have been opposed to the act in principle, because I felt it was improperly drawn, and could be misconstrued. Perhaps the difficulty is merely with the regulations and directives issued by certain individuals in the State Department. At any rate the effect of the new act is not as was hoped by its proponents, and I believe it will be wise to reexamine it and correct the most glaring injustices.

Before this new law many Germans received immigration visas and have become residents in the United States. The majority of these persons who have complied with all our regulations, and who were carefully screened before they were given their visas, are now subject to deportation, merely because at one time they served in the Germany Army, or had been nominal members of the party, or of the party labor union, or of one of the youth movements. The irony of this situation is that at one time after the end of hostilities German ex-soldiers were barred from immigration, because they had served in the German Army. The State Department later changed this when it was realized that after all these soldiers had merely done their duty. These ex-soldiers were no longer considered as members of an organization hostile to the United States and were given visas. Now as a result of the enactment of the new Security Act they are again barred and refused immigration visas.

Since the law became effective about 5,000 German and Italian immigrants and businessmen visitors have been taken to Ellis Island, where many were held for 2 or 3 weeks, some even longer, all because they were at one time members of the Labor Front, Hitler Youth, or had served as soldiers. After some time the Attorney General has admitted them temporarily for 6 months under the ninth proviso, because he cannot, under the new law, admit them permanently. It is hoped that the status of these persons can be adjusted after the Congress has corrected the obvious injustices in the new law, which have caused these difficulties.

Meanwhile such temporary admission is of doubtful value to the immigrant. He cannot know whether or not he will ultimately be excluded. Therefore he cannot seek a job or establish a home. This uncertainty is deplorable because many of these immigrants waited 2 and 3 years for their visas, and when they finally did receive them, gave up their jobs, sold their possessions, and now have no existence in the old country to which they can return.

The cases of former German soldiers are all the more unjust when we realize that before they receive their visas the consuls first asked High Commissioner McCloy, who assured them that the new law did not apply to immigrants merely because they had served as soldiers in the German Army. Yet upon their arrival the Immigration Service detained them at Ellis Island and subsequently admitted them, but only temporarily for 6 months. Some of these men left their wives and children in Europe hoping to establish themselves and then bring their families over. Unless the law is changed these men who have complied with all our regulations, have no assurance they will ultimately be admitted.

The new law is especially severe on very young people. At the age of 10 under the Hitler regime all boys and girls were automatically enrolled in the Hitler Youth. This enrollment was not voluntary. The children had to enroll, or their parents had to bear the consequences. The same thing applied to the Labor Front, the all-embracing German Labor Union. To hold a job a worker had to join the union. If he did not he could not get the job. Yet, all these former members are penalized by the new law, despite the fact that the Hitler Youth and all other Nazi Party affiliates were dissolved in 1945, and despite the fact that General Clay, in Christmas 1947, issued a general amnesty for all German youth.

Among the persons detained recently on Ellis Island were many young girls who at one time had belonged to the Hitler Youth. One girl had managed to avoid joining until 1944, when she could no longer find excuses and had to enroll. By reason of her membership of approximately 1 year in the Hitler Youth she was detained on her arrival. Many of these detainees are girls who had married American soldiers. Most of them were too young to be seriously contaminated by the Nazi ideas. Young people, now 19 or 20 years old, were only 15 when the Nazis collapsed. Since then they have been in contact with Americans and have been free from Nazi influences. Yet, under the new law they are penalized for their involuntary one-time membership in these Hitler organizations.

The new Security Act also interferes with business. Many German businessmen who wish to come here as visitors, and whose presence in the United States is important to us today, are unable to come because they cannot receive visas if they were nominal party members, or if they belonged to the Labor Front or any other affiliate. This is especially annoying at this time, when we are trying to stimulate German trade. On the one hand, we finance a dollar drive and bring German businessmen here for that purpose under the auspices of the State Department. On the other hand, our Immigration Service tells them they may not enter because at one time in their lives they belonged to the wrong political party.

Mr. President, about a week or 10 days after the Internal Security Act was passed, I received a telephone call from Milwaukee. It came from the German-American Society, an organization which is made up of the most loyal Americans to be found anywhere in our country. After a great deal of trouble, and after working for 2 years, they had been able to get a German industrialist, with a credit of over $7,000,000 to come to America for the purpose of purchasing cheese-making machinery for use in Germany. He came to this country with his wife. When he arrived in America he was taken by the Naturalization and Immigration Service and put on Ellis Island. He and his wife were separated for 2 days. Finally the society asked me to see what I could do for them. They wanted me to try to obtain their release. Attorney General McGrath, when appealed to, finally saw to it that the man was taken out of the place in which he had been separated from his wife. His wife had been put in one place and he had been put in another place.

When I got there I found other industrialists, leading men of Germany, who were coming over here to spend their money so that they might build up trade between the United States and Germany.

What is happening in Germany and Austria? American automobiles cannot be sold because the German and Austrian peoples do not have the dollars. So automobiles come in from England, Czechoslovakia, and other countries, to compete with American automobiles. I inquired from the man handling the Chrysler machine over there, and found that in Austria this year only 12 Chryslers were sold.

And what of the psychological effect on the Germans of this new law? Some time ago we penalized them because they fought against Russia. Now we ask them to rearm, to help defend the West. Now we tell them that it is all right to be a soldier. But at the same time we tell them they are excluded from the United States because they had been soldiers. People in Germany are saying, "Are we good enough only for cannon fodder, but not good enough to be immigrants?" Could anyone blame the Germans if they feel reluctant to fight with, or for us? Can we expect men to defend our country if we do not consider them good enough to enter our shores, and especially when we base our refusal on the fact that they have at one time been soldiers and helped to defend their country against Russia, the same country which we now ask them to help us to fight?

Millions of these people are relatives of the 33,000,000 American citizens of Teutonic origin in this country. Many of them are brothers of American citizens and many are related in other ways. Many of them receive money from their relatives in the United States so that they may come to this country and go to the Midwest and other places where so many American citizens of Teutonic origin live.

This situation, like many others involving Germany in recent years, plays into the hands of the Communists. Make no mistake about it, the Communists are aware of these things and constantly point them out to the Germans. Just as with denazification, so this interpretation of the security law tends to divide the Germans from the Americans. That was the purpose of the Communists and fellow travelers in Washington who originated the Morgenthau plan, the denazification, and other evils in Germany. They knew that the majority of decent Germans were only too glad when the Americans came because they hoped thereby to throw off the Nazi yoke. Such a policy did not suit Moscow. Germans friendly to America was the last thing the Kremlin wanted. The long-range hope and plan of the Russians is to communize Germany, and to use the German industrial potential against the west. These policies and mistakes made in Washington—if they are mistakes—all help the Russians and harm the United States.

The recent elections in Germany have demonstrated that the Russians have succeeded only too well. The editorial appearing in the Saturday Evening Post for November 25, 1950, though written several weeks before the elections, has painted the picture, and the recent elections have proven that it is correct.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his suggestion of the absence of a quorum?

Mr. LANGER. I withhold it.

Mr. GEORGE. Unless some Senator desires to take up something else, I am about to move that the Senate take a recess until tomorrow.

Mr. LANGER. I had understood that the Rosenberg nomination was coming up. I certainly withdraw the call for a quorum.

RECESS

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, December 20, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 19 (legislative day of November 27), 1950:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art willing and able to do for us abundantly above all that we can ask or think, we humbly confess that we are frequently so confused and bewildered in our search for the true, the beautiful, and the good.

Daily we are conscious of how unequal we are to our tasks and how much we need Thee. We know that we cannot find the right solution to our problems on the basis of our own finite wisdom.

When we think of man's inhumanity to man we are tempted to believe that many members of the human family have lost their capacity for kindly feelings toward one another.

Thou knowest how desperately mankind needs the regenerating presence and power of Thy divine spirit. This is our only hope for a better world wherein dwelleth righteousness and peace.

Grant that we may have the faith and the courage to believe in the regeneration and salvation of all the members of the human race.

Hear us in the name of the Christ of Christmas who became the Son of Man in order that men everywhere might become the sons of God. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Woodruff, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4803) entitled "An act for the relief of Bernard F. Elmers."

The message also announced that the Vice President has appointed Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina and Mr. LANGER members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of August 5, 1939, entitled "An act to provide for the disposition of certain records of the United States Government," for the disposition of executive papers referred to in the report of the Archivist of the United States numbered 51–10.

IMPORTATION OF TEXTILE MACHINERY AND PARTS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 8881) to permit educational, religious, or charitable institutions to import textile machines and parts thereof for instructional purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice this is a bill that exempts textile machines and parts thereof from duty when imported for instruction in educational, religious, or charitable institutions.

I wish to know, Mr. Speaker, who is seeking this legislation. As I recall, we have excellent machinery in our own textile industry that can be used for educational purposes. We have had some experience with the Textron Co. forming one of these charitable corporations, which has been a great deal of trouble to the textile industry throughout the United States. I wish to ask the gentleman from North Carolina, chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, if he will be kind enough to explain to the House the reason for this legislation and why it is necessary at this hour.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COOLEY], chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of the House.

The bill would permit the free entry, under the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, of any textile machine or machinery or parts thereof imported by any society or institution incorporated or established solely for educational, religious, or charitable purposes for its own use in the instruction of students and not for sale or for any commercial use under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Department of State, Treasury Department, and the Department of Commerce have advised that they would have no objection to the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill comes here under unanimous report of the Committee on Ways and Means. In Switzerland there has been created or invented a machine that seems to be superior to machines in this country for weaving cloth. The universities that are teaching the students the manufacture of fabric want them to have the benefit of this new machinery for the benefit of our country. Sometimes we have had to bring in machinery from foreign lands by smuggling. That is the way the business of fabrics has been built up in this country. Sometimes they are brought in by small parts and put together. That is what has developed New England and North Carolina in this line of work. These machines cannot be used when imported for this purpose except in educational institutions where they are teaching the manufacture of fabrics.

They cannot be used for commercial purposes, so they will not come in competition with anything manufactured here.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Or cannot be put up for resale.

Mr. REED of New York. They cannot be put up for resale.

Mr. GROSS. Is private industry paying for these machines?

Mr. REED of New York. No; the colleges are paying for them so the students can be taught the latest and most improved methods in regard to the manufacture of fabrics.

Mr. HESELTON. Has any testimony been taken from the manufacturers of fabrics in this country?

Mr. REED of New York. No. There is no opposition to this from that source. It is to their benefit.

Mr. BRYSON. Is it contemplated that after these machines are imported without the payment of duty and the students are taught, then commercial enterprise will need to purchase that machinery so that they can use them?

Mr. REED of New York. After they are here, they can improve on them or manufacture them or do what they want to with them. There is no reason for imposing a tariff on educational institutions that want to use the latest and most improved machinery for the teaching of their students.

Mr. BRYSON. I do not admit we have to import the latest and finest textile machinery. I think we have shown the world that we can manufacture them ourselves.

Mr. REED of New York. If we are going to control our foreign markets we have to have the latest methods because they are in competition with us. We eventually will have to have the machinery and we will manufacture them here.

Mr. BRYSON. There are other factors entering into this besides improved machinery. A large part of India's textiles, for instance, are produced by hand. The textile worker in India receives $67 a year, while the textile worker in my district receives $67 a week. We cannot compete with this foreign slave labor in any case.

Mr. REED of New York. Taking the tariff off of a superior machine to produce fabrics more cheaply makes it easier for us to compete with the cheap labor abroad in the world market.

Mr. BRYSON. It is not contemplated that any appreciable quantity will be imported?

Mr. REED of New York. No; probably North Carolina, South Carolina, and one or two other States will have the benefit.

Mr. BRYSON. Do not let North Carolina take precedence over South Carolina in textiles.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end of part II (the free list) thereof a new paragraph to read as follows:

"PAR. 1817. Any society or institution incorporated or established solely for educational, religious, or charitable purposes may import free of duty any textile machine or machinery, or part thereof, for its own use in the instruction of students and not for sale or for any commercial use, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, strike out "part II" and insert "title II."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SPECIAL ORDER TRANSFERRED

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the special order granted me for today be transferred to tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

TIME FOR UNITY

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERLONG. Mr. Speaker, a new word, "reexaminist," has recently been coined in our language. I approve of that word in its fullest sense. I think it is time we all became reexaminists. Let us start by reexamining ourselves; then let us reexamine our criticisms and our motives for criticism. Let us reexamine our hearts, our souls, and our minds, to be sure that what we say and do is really best for America. Let us be sure that our thinking and actions are not just the result of political bias. I do not believe in criticism simply for criticism's sake. The best defense against a bad idea is always a better idea. Destructive criticism never helped anyone. This is no time for hindsight. It is time that we forget everything except the menace surrounding us and unite as one—without politics—to present a solid front against the enemies who seek to destroy us. There is no time now for carping and criticism—there may be just barely time to join our forces—but if ever there was a time for unity, that time is now.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Speaker, I note with much satisfaction that a resolution which would have proved embarrassing to the President and to our Secretary of State was unfavorably acted upon. In the perilous situation which our country faces, it is imperative that every citizen, whether they be in high places or low places, join in unity and patriotism to prepare for any eventuality. Surely unified action rather than unjustified sniping at those charged with the responsibility of the conduct of our diplomatic affairs is the most desirable course.

Mr. Speaker, I am today filing the petition of the Allegheny County Committee representing more than 50 individual American Legion posts in Allegheny County, Pa., urging the immediate adoption by Congress of universal military training, and setting forth that all other methods being inadequate, that such training is the only solution for the protection of this Government and the prevention of world war III.

I am confident that at the convening of the Eighty-second Congress immediate consideration will be given to this far-reaching proposal.

AMENDING THE NATURAL GAS ACT

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include certain excerpts from news articles, a letter, and certain tabulations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. HESELTON. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a resolution to amend the Natural Gas Act so as to give the Federal Power Commission the authority to prescribe safety requirements with respect to the construction, extension, operation, and maintenance of their transportation facilities.

I think all of us will recall reading in the latter part of November of the explosions in this vicinity on two sections of a transcontinental natural gas pipeline on two successive days.

The first, on November 23, caused injuries to a mother and two children and also caused substantial property damage near Culpeper, Va.

On the next day another section of a pipeline exploded at King of Prussia, Pa. Two persons were injured in this explosion and there was also property damage.

I requested a check on previous explosions. There was no information available from the Federal Power Commission because it does not have any authority or duty in connection with such explosions.

I did find, however, that there have been at least four additional explosions this year.

A pipeline exploded on July 2 at Beallsville, Ohio, but I have not located any detailed account of the result of that explosion.

On July 15 there was an explosion on the Big Inch line at West Chester, Pa., killing one young man and injuring two. One of the injured men died on July 22.

An explosion occurred at Wadley, La., on September 20. In this instance there were no injuries.

A gas pipeline exploded near Greenville, Miss., on December 4. Two persons were killed and two were injured, all workmen for the Tennessee Gas Transmission Co. The terrific blast tossed debris 250 feet into the air and resulting fire scorched a strip of ground an eighth of a mile wide.

Under permission granted to me, I now want to include news dispatches in the press with reference to these explosions:

PIPELINE BLAST, FIRE BURNS THREE NEAR CULPEPER—MOTHER, TWO CHILDREN VICTIMS AS EXPLOSION DAMAGES TWO FARMS

CULPEPER, VA., November 23.—A 1,000-foot section of a transcontinental natural-gas pipeline exploded near here late yesterday, injuring three persons and sending flash flames 300 feet into the air.

Trooper C. H. Moore, of the Virginia State Police, said Mrs. John F. Suter, her daughter, Mildred, 19, and her son, Jim, 5, suffered burns to their backs, arms, legs, and necks. They were treated at the Medical Arts Center here and released. Mr. Suter's property, located about 75 yards from the explosion, suffered some damage.

The explosion occurred about 9 miles southeast of here, near route 647, and not far from the village of Lignum. The blast could be heard faintly in Culpeper. It shook windows within a 4-mile area.

SUTER HOME DAMAGED

The big section of 30-inch pipe, buried 8 feet in the ground, was part of the line stretching from Texas to New York. It does not supply gas to any part of the Washington area.

Fire broke out immediately, and the glow of the flames was visible for miles around. The back part of Mr. Suter's house was ripped off, several outbuildings were destroyed, and some pigs, a dozen chickens, and a hawk were killed by concussion. Mr. Suter was working in a field beyond the gas line and had to detour between 15 to 20 miles to reach his home.

Another house owned by Earl Hawkins, which also was about 75 yards from the explosion, had a few broken windows, and two brooder houses were destroyed by the fire, the police reported.

Also damaged was a section of route 647, under which the pipeline was laid. A piece of pavement about 18 feet square was uprooted on each side.

GAS CUT OFF

On arrival at the scene Trooper Moore called his station by radio, and the flow of gas was cut off at the nearest pipeline station, causing the flames to die down a bit. Even so, the flames continued to shoot from the broken pipeline for hours afterward.

Sheriff B. H. Wayland, of Culpeper County, said he saw the flames from 7 miles away.

"It looked like a flash of lightning," he declared.

The explosion occurred in a new section of line. Trooper Moore said some gas had been put in the pipeline yesterday while pressure was being checked.

The line, he said, is owned by the Transcontinental Gas Line Co., of Houston, Tex., and was designed to serve only the New York area. The Culpeper section was completed about a month ago. The line crosses the Potomac River near Great Falls on its way north.

A later news account stated that the explosion ripped up a section of State Route 647 minutes after a loaded school bus had passed over the spot.

GAS PIPELINE EXPLOSION ROCKS PENNSYLVANIA AREA FOR 7 MILES

KING OF PRUSSIA, PA., November 24.—A blast, ripping the earth with terrific force, tore up a mile of a Texas-to-New York natural gas pipeline yesterday, rocking this fertile farm area for 7 miles in all directions.

Blinding flames shot 300 feet in the air and seared trees and grass.

Huge chunks of the metal pipeline were thrown with rocket speed into fields. Windows in homes miles from the explosion were shattered.

Two persons were injured.

Two outbuildings on the farm of Peter Camiel, where the blast originated, were destroyed by flames that baked the earth for 150 feet on both sides.

ONE HUNDRED FIRE ENGINES REPORT

More than 100 fire engines from a score of small communities in the vicinity of this Montgomery County community rushed equipment to the scene.

(A similar explosion occurred Wednesday near Culpeper, Va., another section of Transcontinental's Texas-to-New York system. Three persons were burned in Wednesday's blast, which was heard for several miles in the Culpeper area.)

Firemen and police said they had been alerted to watch for trouble on the new section of pipeline by representatives of Transcontinental Pipelines, Inc.

TESTING BEGAN TUESDAY

A pressure test was begun Tuesday and firemen were ordered to stand by for possible trouble. Several homes in the vicinity of the pipeline were ordered evacuated before the pressure tests began.

Injured slightly in the blast were Edwin Camiel, 27, and his brother Joseph, 21, who were gunning for their Thanksgiving turkey on the farm owned by their brother, Peter.

Both men were hurled into the air by the force of the blast though they were 500 feet away from the pipeline. Joseph Camiel suffered a sprained ankle as he fell after the blast. Edwin was bruised.

PIPELINE BLAST INVESTIGATED

BEALLSVILLE, OHIO, July 2.—Officials of the Texas Eastern Gas Co. today investigated the cause of an explosion that ripped up 12 feet of the Big Inch pipeline 2 miles southeast of here. Flames towered in the sky, casting a glow visible within a 65-mile radius. The pipeline carries natural gas from Texas to New York.

SECOND DEAD IN BIG INCH BLAST

PHILADELPHIA, July 22.—Donald Ciccarone, 17 years old, a West Chester High School junior, died today of injuries suffered last Friday in an explosion at the Big Inch pipeline depot 10 miles north of West Chester. Lewis (Pete) Kellar, 21, former star athlete at West Chester High, was killed instantly.

BIG INCH BLAST KILLS YOUTH

WEST CHESTER, PA., July 15.—Lewis (Pete) Keller, 21 years old, former West Chester, Pa., high school star athlete was killed and two other youths injured today in an explosion on the Big Inch gas pipeline. The explosion came when pressure in the pipe blew both a cover plate and a cleaning tool out of the pit where the youths were trying to remove the tool.

EXPLOSION RIPS GAS PIPELINE

WADLEY, LA., September 20.—A newly completed Texas-to-New York natural-gas pipeline exploded near here today as engineers began building up pressure to put the big line into use. There were no injuries.. The blast ripped out about 300 yards of the line owned by the Transcontinental Gas Pipeline Corp. of Houston. The line was cut off over a 14-mile stretch at two substations soon after the explosion.

TWO KILLED BY GAS PIPELINE EXPLOSION NEAR GREENVILLE, MISS.

GREENVILLE, MISS., December 5.—A gas pipeline exploded near here shortly before noon Monday, killing two persons and injuring two others. The terrific blast, which occurred at 11:27 a. m. (central standard time), tossed debris 250 feet into the air and resulting fire scorched a strip of ground an eighth of a mile wide. Those killed and injured were workmen for the Tennessee Gas Transmission Co., which is installing four 26-inch lines across the Mississippi River.

I have conferred with the counsel for the Federal Power Commission and he advises me that under existing law, the only power the Commission has with reference to safety requirements are in connection with the normal conditions which may be incorporated into the initial certificate.

I have also received a letter from Commissioner Nelson Lee Smith, which is self-explanatory, with the statistical information referred to in that letter. I want this to be a part of the RECORD.

With the expanding use of natural gas it seems to be self-evident that with sometning like 100,000 miles of main transmission pipelines in operation or authorized, and 65,000 of those miles now in operation constructed before certificates were required, and also with applications for 16,000 miles of such lines still pending, there is a very real need of thorough consideration of legislation in this field. There is ample precedent in connection with the safe operations in other public utilities. Now, with these large lines carrying heavy potential explosive possibilities into more and more congested areas the matter is becoming increasingly urgent. I am particularly interested in view of the construction in the near future of 144 miles of 120-inch line in Massachusetts, some of it going directly through the First District. There is also 268 miles of somewhat smaller capacity line to be constructed in Connecticut and New Hampshire.

A further factor is involved. When the pipeline companies had to negotiate for contracts or right-of-way, the owner of the real estate could include consideration of the safety factor in the negotiations for such contract. Now, with the power of eminent domain, he is certainly more limited in his ability to make a satisfactory contract.

In any event, the major consideration should be insuring the safety of those who live or work near any one of these lines or who have occasion to pass over their locations.

I realize that it is practically impossible to obtain any immediate consideration of the proposal at this session of Congress. But I do think it important that the bill be filed so that the Commission or any other agencies interested can begin work on their reports so that they can be made available early in the next session of Congress, and I shall refile the bill when that Congress convenes.

Under permission granted to me I am including here Commissioner Smith's letter and the enclosure:

FEDERAL POWER COMMISSION,
Washington, December 18, 1950.

Hon. JOHN W. HESELTON,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN HESELTON: Pursuant to your telephone request of Thursday, December 14, 1950, there are attached hereto four tabulations prepared by our staff.

Table A shows, by States, the total miles of natural-gas mains at the end of 1949 as reported by the American Gas Association. These figures include field lines, gathering lines, transmission and distribution main, but exclude service pipe. They do not include pipelines carrying a mixture of natural and manufactured gas.

Table B shows, by States, the total miles of natural-gas mains at the end of 1949 which are classified as being used for the transmission of natural gas. Excluded from the tabulation are the mileages of field and gathering lines, and distribution pipelines. Mixed gas lines are also excluded from this tabulation.

Table C lists only the mileages of natural-gas transmission main to be used for the transportation of natural gas in interstate commerce, as authorized by this Commission, for the period from January 1, 1950, to November 10, 1950. Excluded herein are projects for which the total estimated construction costs are less than $700,000. This tabulation is not directly comparable with table B since table C does not contain data on intrastate transmission mains which are not subject to the jurisdiction of this Commission.

Table C also lists the mileages and pipeline diameters authorized. A breakdown of the mileages by States is not readily available in all instances. Some of this information could be obtained, approximately, by scaling off the maps filed with the applications. This, however, would probably require a week or 10 days to complete; it will not be undertaken except in response to any further request which you may make.

Table D is similar to table C, but lists the major projects pending with the Commission as of November 10, 1950. The tabulation indicates by appropriate footnotes the pending projects which are competitive with each other.

As I told Mrs. Heselton over the phone on Friday, it is approximately correct to say that there are now in operation or authorized in the neighborhood of 100,000 miles of main transmission gas pipelines, of which some 35,000 have been certificated by this Commission since it was given authority over these matters by amendment of the Natural Gas Act in 1942, with applications covering about 16,000 miles of line still pending.

If further information is desired, we shall be pleased to furnish whatever may be available to us.

Sincerely yours,

NELSON LEE SMITH,
Commissioner.

SPIRITUAL PREPARATION

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks and include a resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, when the first meeting of the United Nations was assembled for the purpose of perfecting the organization, we were shocked to discover that God was ignored. The chief reason for the rejection of the Creator from the momentous deliberations of this organization was the fear that any mention of the Supreme Being might be offensive to our "good allies," the atheistic representatives of the Soviet Government.

Today, as we look back on the most appalling record of futility and confusion ever presented by an assembly of presumably intelligent statesmen, it should be evident that there is a connection between the exclusion of God from the UN and the colossal failures that have characterized its efforts. Is it not possible that if the delegates, from now on, humbly call on God for light and guidance before each session they will be more successful? In these critical days of anxiety and fear it might be well to try this plan. Those of us who had concluded that we must have some sort of union of the Nations in order to preserve peace, still have great hope in the organization. There are those who now believe it still to be imperative to have divine wisdom and guidance if the undertaking is to succeed.

In this connection, I am making a special effort to have our Judiciary Committee report favorably today on House Resolution 886, as introduced by our colleague the gentleman from Florida [Mr. ROGERS], calling for a day of prayer. I attach hereto a recent resolution passed by the International Christian Leadership, Inc.:

RESOLUTION ADOPTED BY THE BOARD OF DIRECTORS, INTERNATIONAL CHRISTIAN LEADERSHIP, INC., DECEMBER 16, 1950, AT WASHINGTON, D. C.

The President has announced a state of national emergency and issued his orders requiring disciplined living and national cooperation in the great task before us.

We recognize the need of spiritual preparation that we may more adequately meet the great responsibilities of this hour.

We further recognize the overwhelming odds that confront us in the Far East and the problems in other parts of the world.

In all of this we recognize our utter dependence on Almighty God and the need for our adherence to His prescription for national well-being saying: "If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face, and turn from their wicked ways; then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land."

Be it therefore resolved, That we request the elected representatives of the people, the United States Senate and House of Representatives, to issue a call to the Nation for a day of prayer and daily individual spiritual preparation invoking the grace, guidance, and wisdom of God to all of us but particularly to those charged with major decisions and leadership.

Respectfully submitted.

WILLARD S. PAUL,
President.
DONALD C. STONE,
Vice President.
CLYDE DOYLE,
Secretary.
ABRAHAM VEREIDE,
Executive Director.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. CANFIELD asked and was given permission to address the House for 10 minutes today, following any special orders heretofore entered.

MANAGEMENT-LABOR RELATIONS

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, satisfactory relations between management and labor in America reached a new high this week with the awarding of $150 in bonuses to each of 20,000 Endicott-Johnson workers in the Triple Cities area in my district.

I believe as long as a relationship of this kind exists between management and labor we need have no concern about the perpetuation of our American system. I know no better way to distribute corporation funds than among the rank and file of the workers of any corporation. I commend the officials of Endicott-Johnson for doing such a magnanimous thing. I believe every corporation and concern in the country could well emulate the example of Endicott-Johnson, because as long as the average worker is able to receive a Christmas bonus of that amount of money he will be able to feed and clothe and improve the lot of his family.

I dare say that had other concerns in this country learned from Endicott-Johnson how to extend a friendly hand to their workers, we would scarcely know the meaning of labor strife today.

Endicott-Johnson long ago accurately concluded that their workers were their greatest asset. The founder of this great shoe concern, the late George F. Johnson, believed that everybody had the right to work and to live.

Consequently, he built free parks and playgrounds, free dancehalls and recreation centers, established free medicine and clinics for all his workers.

No industrialist ever went so far down the line to cement friendly relations with personnel. No other business head 50 years ago considered such steps necessary.

However, because of such tokens of appreciation for loyal and steady work as these benefits I have described, Endicott-Johnson has known practically no labor strife and very little but industrial harmony. I, for one, am glad to see such a forthright policy being perpetuated in the form of the current Christmas bonus.

DEFENSE PROGRAM

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAVIN. Mr. Speaker, during the past month I have had the opportunity to observe at first hand conditions in several European countries, and to check the present status of our defense program with American officials and representatives in Europe, as well as certain political and military leaders of that continent.

In almost all countries, there has been a marked improvement in economic conditions during the past year and the contrast with the desperate situation which prevailed in 1947 is very heartening. In view of this substantial improvement and recovery, and the heavy burdens and sacrifices which our own people are being called upon to bear at this time, it is my belief that the expenditure of further funds for economic recovery in Europe should, with a few exceptions, be drastically curtailed, and promptly terminated. I recognize that there are some projects which are nearing completion, and should be finished, and that in certain difficult areas, particularly Berlin, economic assistance will be required for a longer period. In the main, however, Europe is relatively prosperous; food supplies are ample; and people appear to be well-clothed, well-shod, and adequately fed.

With respect to the military defenses of Western Europe, I regret to state that after a year and one-half of the North Atlantic Pact and the agencies implementing that treaty, there has resulted no substantial defense for Western Europe. Our own occupation forces in Germany and Austria while well-organized and trained, are completely inadequate to meet a major Communist offensive. Despite the imminence of the danger, there is little or no sense of urgency in most European countries; and the only nation in a state of emergency appears to be the United States.

If the defense of Europe is to be prepared on any realistic basis, with even a chance of success, the military potential of Germany, both in manpower and industrial capacity, must be fully and promptly utilized. The present plans for organizing small German units for incorporation in the European army are, in my opinion, inadequate and entirely unrealistic. As I stated last February, our German policies must be reexamined on an over-all basis; and if we are to achieve any worthwhile results in that country, we must act promptly and vigorously. We must plan on 20 to 30 German divisions organized, directed, and, so far as possible, supplied by Germany, under an over-all United Nations commander and staff. To achieve this, it will require a fundamental change in our present policies in Germany—a change long overdue.

In addition to rearming the Germans for the protection of their country, we must utilize the important strategic position and the dependable anti-Communist forces in Spain. Our "head in the sand" policy toward that country must be promptly and drastically changed. I am convinced that relatively modest military aid to Spain will produce results of far greater value than much larger sums now being expended in certain other countries.

Finally, our diplomatic representatives must bring home to the European countries that the world-wide threat of communism is greater and more immediate for them than for the United States, and that we cannot undertake alone to furnish the raw materials, the weapons—and the manpower—to defeat Soviet imperialism in Europe.

As a result of my trip I am forced to conclude that we find ourselves, 5 years after the war, in a grave military position in Europe; and further that vastly increased efforts on the part of the European countries will be required if we are to meet the threat to the free world.

SECRETARY OF STATE ACHESON

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, if I understood the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HERLONG] correctly, he wants us to forget the things that have gone before. As to some things that might be all right, but under that theory the child that burnt his hand on the stove would just keep on doing it until he had no hand left. We cannot follow the gentleman's suggestion. We must remember what has gone before. Otherwise a ruinous policy would destroy us for lack of criticism.

Then the gentleman intimated we should not criticize, we should not attempt to oust Mr. Acheson. I cannot agree. I remember reading the scriptures. If I recall correctly, there was a fellow named Jonah. They had to throw him overboard before they could quiet the storm, reach port safely.

That is the situation just as long as Mr. Acheson stays in the administration. Don't fool yourselves. The people do not like him. They do not trust him. They have no confidence in him and just so long as he is in the administration, they will not wholeheartedly, willingly, and enthusiastically support the administration. They will do their part—because they are loyal—but their hearts will not be in their efforts.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

SECRETARY OF STATE ACHESON

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, if the statement made by the gentleman from Florida was intended to advocate the silencing of the criticism directed at Mr. Acheson and others, then I disapprove. I am sorry to say that I did not like either the tone or the spirit of the gentleman's statement, because, as I felt, it rather suggested the thought that we should enter a confession of our imbecility or incapacity or incompetency to function as the legislative body of this country. But, aside from this, I want to say to you gentlemen that the conditions of the world are such that nothing less than general mobilization, which is war, is needed, rather than the declaration of a national emergency, which is politics.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

SECRETARY OF STATE ACHESON—ALGER HISS AND ANNA ROSENBERG

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat embarrassed at this argument about Mr. Acheson. I am probably more responsible for Mr. Acheson being Secretary of State than any other man alive. It was my amendment to the rules of the House which created the Committee on Un-American Activities that exposed the treason of Alger Hiss. If it had not been for that, Hiss probably would be Secretary of State now, and Acheson would be his assistant.

But to show you how the line is being followed, Anna Rosenberg, a little Yiddish woman from Austria-Hungary, will now become Assistant Secretary of National Defense, if confirmed by the Senate, and will have more power over the lives of the American people than was ever exercised by any American President.

While General Marshall wonders where he was the night before.

God save America.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

GENERAL EISENHOWER

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, here we can only express the opinion of one Member. I simply take the floor to express my own personal opinion for the benefit of the people of my district. I very much regret that General Eisenhower has been made supreme commander of the so-called United Nations forces of Europe. I think we are the goat on the Asian Continent, and I think we will be the goat on the European Continent. I would much prefer to see General Montgomery made head man over there so that those people who are close to the situation can look after their own backyard without forever and eternally putting the blame and responsibility upon the people of the United States. I feel we have done our share and will always do our share, and that the other countries of the earth are today imposing upon us, and that it is only a matter of a few months until we will have demonstrated that the manpower of the United States is not sufficient to physically lick the Russian-directed manpower of the balance of the world.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

UNITED NATIONS

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BATTLE. Mr. Speaker, I have long been a supporter and a booster of the United Nations. I feel that a strong, vigorous world organization constitutes one of the best hopes of freedom for mankind and the survival of civilization itself.

It is a matter of great concern to me, therefore, to note the possibility that the General Assembly may adjourn in a few days without recognizing or acting upon the new phase of the Korean war which was brought about by the aggression of the Red Chinese. To me it seems clear that the hope for the very existence of the United Nations in the future is with the General Assembly since the Security Council has been rendered helpless by the Russian veto. Therefore, it is vital that in the interest of world peace the General Assembly continue to meet until some definite plan can be worked out toward solving the present crisis involving the aggression of a new nation. It is disheartening to many stanch UN supporters that China's aggression to date has been practically ignored by the General Assembly as far as official action is concerned.

The nature of the action taken would, of course, have to depend on developments, but there are certain measures which should be undertaken without delay. In the first place, the General Assembly must brand the Red Chinese as world aggressors. Secondly, I think we would do well to clamp a complete economic embargo on Red China as an official act of the United Nations.

The UN showed real promise last summer when it made the historic decision to put down the aggressors in Korea. It would be tragic, indeed, to falter now when the fate of the world is at stake.

CRITICISM WITHOUT CONSTRUCTIVE SUGGESTION

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLLING. Mr. Speaker, during the past 2 weeks I have been very much disturbed by the simple fact that there has been a great deal of personal criticism of individuals and no constructive suggestion as to how better this country might meet the problems that confront it at home and abroad. It seems to me that the irresponsibility of those individual criticisms is revealed clearly by the total absence of any constructive suggestions to accompany them. It must be very clear to everyone that the responsibilities which this country has and which we as individual members of this great body have are so great that we must apply ourselves to achieving the best solutions of our critical problems, at this time which may be a turning point in all the world's history, a time of world-wide decision for freedom or for slavery.

The time has come when criticize we may, but criticize without responsibility we cannot.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

CRITICISM OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] has related the story of Jonah and the whale. I might add to his remarks by recalling that even the whale could not stomach Jonah and lost little time in disgorging him through the process of regurgitation.

My heart goes out to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. HERLONG] and others on the right side of the aisle who bewail criticism of Secretary Acheson and others in their beloved administration who have gotten us into the mess in which we find ourselves. I would not like it either if we Republicans were responsible for such inept and blundering leadership.

In my opinion, criticism of incompetent officials must go on until changes are made. Not until then will the people of this Nation have any confidence in their Government. There are very few Americans today who do not know the true facts about our foreign policies that have brought this Nation to its greatest crisis. They know that Acheson, Lattimore, Hiss, and their ilk sold us down the river in Asia. They know that if we had stood by Chiang Kai-shek and the Nationalist government in China who were our allies in World War II, there would be no Communist forces in China, Manchuria, and Korea today.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on Calendar Wednesday may be dispensed with this week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Armed Services may have until midnight tonight to file reports.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I yield back my time and will use it tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CANFIELD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

POSTAL SERVICE STANDARDS

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, during the fall campaign I attended many forum meetings in my district during which there were question and answer periods. Always there were questions about the ever-lowering standards of our national postal service. Many women asked the question: "When will the postal service be normalized in the United States?"

Last July the Commerce and Industry Association of New York conducted a survey of the postal service following numerous complaints about the institution of service curtailments on June 1, 1950. At that time hundreds of association members replied citing examples of delays and adverse effects of the curtailments. After that survey the Post Office Department cooperated in attempting to overcome some of the major difficulties found. The Association issued on December 1 a follow-up questionnaire to learn effects of mail service curtailments on business firms during the past 3 months. The questionnaire requested specific instances which were attributable to service curtailments beginning June 1, 1950, rather than isolated instances which might have occurred irrespective of the curtailments put into effect at that time. To date 343 replies from business firms in New York City have been received. Although a complete tabulation of replies has not been made, generally the complaints of the service fall into the following categories:

Outgoing mail: Since the branch post offices will not accept any mail after 5:30 p. m. business firms have been hard pressed to meet this deadline. Mail prepared in the late afternoon cannot be processed through the mail room in time to have it reach the post office before the deadline. Thus a one-day delay occurs immediately.

Service windows close at 5:30 p. m. and it is impossible to obtain insurance or registry service at the branch offices, and the business houses must go long distances either to the main post office or an annex if the need is urgent.

Delivery of mail, particularly third class mail, has been very slow. Instances have been cited where mail from one midtown Manhattan point takes 2 days to arrive at another point in midtown. Mail which usually took merely overnight, now is being delivered in the late morning or in the afternoon.

Parcel post: Service has been particularly bad in this mail category. Many say quite frankly that the time of arrival of parcel post packages is guesswork. Business firms are now finding that from 2 to 6 days are added to the time previously required for delivery. This is true not only for long distance parcels but for intracity deliveries where the jams on railroads cannot be blamed.

Incoming mail: Mail deliveries in the morning are one-half to three-quarters of an hour later than prior to June 1. A firm which previously had its mail opened and distributed shortly after the beginning of operations, now finds that the office staff must sit around for as much as a half hour waiting for the mail in order to begin the day's work.

Directory service: Generally speaking, the reinstitution of the directory service of foreign mail insufficiently addressed is working well in practice. The curtailment of the domestic directory service has worked a hardship on firms because of the added cost and delay of letters returned either because of insufficient or incorrect addresses.

General comments: The comments made on the questionnaire have been that mail service in the past several months has gone from bad to worse. What is unfortunate is that the users of mail detect a lowering of morale of the postal employees and a general reluctance on the part of the Department personnel to provide the usual standard of high service which they had been accustomed to giving.

The mail users now take the attitude that it is anybody's guess when mail or packages will arrive either in the office or at the ultimate destination. In order to insure prompt delivery of local mail, firms have begun to resort more than ever to messenger service and special-delivery service, disregarding the use of Uncle Sam's postal system.

The gentleman who sent me the interim report I have just quoted, Mr. Joseph A. Sinclair, secretary of the Commerce and Industry Association of New York, in his cover letter refers to a personal experience. He is domiciled in Ridgewood, N. J. He states:

I personally did not realize how bad the parcel post service is until this noontime when I ordered a package from one of the downtown stores to be sent out to my home in Ridgewood and was told that it was doubtful that the package would be delivered in Ridgewood (some 20 miles away) before Christmas. This is a period of 10 days.

Mr. Speaker, business is losing in this deal. The Post Office Department of the United States will undoubtedly lose because of this curtailment order of June 1, 1950, and certainly the taxpayers and the patrons of the Post Office are not going to benefit.

I am a reexaminationist when it comes to the postal service of the United States and I think it is high time that the Postmaster General rescind the order as directed in a resolution passed by this House, which resolution is now pending in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANFIELD. I yield to the gentleman from New York who has been so much interested in seeing that these faults are remedied.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I want to congratulate the gentleman for protesting this order of June 1, 1950, because when I went home this summer I found that more people were disgruntled, more business firms were upset and the general order of business and commerce was jeopardized to a greater extent than I had ever noted before, all because of this one order which the Postmaster General put into effect in June of this year.

Mr. CANFIELD. The gentleman will recall the Postmaster General first indicated that the amount of money he expected to save through this order would be $15,000,000. I understand now he has raised this figure to $70,000,000. But even so the loss to business and the loss to the public at large is exceedingly greater.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Has the gentleman any information for the House as to what steps have been taken to loosen the log jam that is holding up approval of this resolution so that it will be placed squarely before the Postmaster General in order for him to rescind the order?

Mr. CANFIELD. May I say to the gentleman from New York I was hoping that the Senate would pass the resolution approved by the House of Representatives directing the Postmaster General to rescind that unfortunate order. The other body has not yet taken action.

And I regret to say the Postmaster General is still under the impression that the people of the United States are quite satisfied with the present mail situation. He insists that he is receiving more complimentary letters than complaints. I am at a loss to understand this and I know many who now refer to the time in yesteryear when they could mail letters and packages with the assurance they would be delivered expeditiously but, they go on to say, Uncle Sam's mail box and Uncle Sam's Post Office do not mean just the same in these days.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SAYLOR for an indefinite period, on account of official business.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1950

(Legislative day of Monday, November 27, 1950)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou desire of nations, as again our hearts are drawn by the lure of the manger, enable our spirits to kindle with the joy of simple shepherds long ago. As every hearth is aflame with the Christmas candles of faith and hope and love, we think tenderly and with pride of our Nation's youth, upon whose embattled loneliness the silent stars look down from alien skies. As in distant corners of the earth they keep their constant vigil for freedom's sake, our wistful prayers for them wing their way to Thee and bind them to us with a nearness which mocks the separating miles.

Hasten the day when the mighty melody above the little eastern town, "Peace to men of good will" shall be the divine harmony of all earth's myriad tongues. We ask it in the dear Redeemer's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. GEORGE, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, December 19, 1950, was dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UNIVERSAL MILITARY TRAINING—LETTER FROM COMMANDERS OF VETERANS' ORGANIZATIONS, MILWAUKEE, WIS.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I was glad to receive this morning a letter from the leading veterans officers of the State of Wisconsin in which they expressed the joint views of their respective organizations on behalf of the enactment of universal military training legislation. It has always been my position that those men who have seen service in the uniform of their nation are entitled to the most earnest consideration when they submit their suggestions on military problems facing our country. Who is in a better position to comment on that issue than the very men who have sacrificed years of their lives, and their bodies, to the service of their country?

We are all becoming increasingly aware of the fact that the half-way, half-hearted, half-baked, inadequate measures adopted thus far for mobilization of the home front on an economic, military and other basis, are doing a grave disservice to our fighting men, as well as to the future of our country. We desperately need to go on an all-out basis if we are to survive as a nation.

I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that there be printed in the RECORD at this point the text of the letter received this morning from these distinguished Wisconsin veterans, together with their names, and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Armed Services, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, together with the names, as follows:

WISCONSIN VETERANS COUNCIL,
Milwaukee, Wis., December 11, 1950.

Senator ALEXANDER WILEY,
Senate Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WILEY: With world conditions in their present perilous state, it is the sincere wish of the undersigned that you give the utmost consideration to this letter.

Meeting in emergency session this morning in Milwaukee, the Wisconsin commanders of every chartered veterans organization in our State unanimously passed a resolution asking that you use your entire influence and assistance in securing the immediate passage of universal military training in legislation.

Our basic interest is, as always, in the security of our Nation, and in beseeching your aid we present a united front of 300,000 Wisconsin veterans. We cannot impress our sentiments in this matter upon you too strongly, for we feel that history will record in indelible letters what action America takes now.

May we count upon your help in this most important program?

Most sincerely,

Jerome E. Host, Department Commander, the American Legion Department of Wisconsin; Dewey A. Decker, Department Commander, AMVETS, Green Bay; Paul P. Moore, Department Commander, Army and Navy Union, Milwaukee; Herbert Pommerening, Department Commander, Disabled American Veterans, Oshkosh; Paul Corbin, Department Commandant, Marine Corps League, Janesville; Richard P. Golick, Department Commander, Military Order of the Purple Heart, Sheboygan-Chicago; George V. Porter, Squadron Commandant, Navy Club of America, Racine; George P. Lohmaier, Department Commander, United Spanish War Veterans, Fort Atkinson; Sverre Roang, Department Commander Veterans of Foreign Wars, Edgerton.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

The following report of a committee was submitted:

By Mr. McCLELLAN, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments:

S. 4266. A bill to amend and extend title II of the First War Powers Act, 1941, with an amendment (Rept. No. 2686).

AUDITS OF GOVERNMENT CORPORATIONS—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE (REPT. NO. 2685)

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, I submit, pursuant to the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1946 (Public Law 601, 79th Cong.), a report relating to audits of Government corporations, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received, and, without objection, printed, as requested by the Senator from Arkansas.

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS, 1951—REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, from the Committee on Appropriations I report favorably, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 9920) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 2684) thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be received and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, does the Senator from Tennessee intend to bring up the bill tomorrow?

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope to do so.

REPORTS ON DISPOSITION OF EXECUTIVE PAPERS

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, from the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Executive Papers, to which were referred for examination and recommendation four lists of records transmitted to the Senate by the Archivist of the United States that appeared to have no permanent value or historical interest, submitted reports thereon pursuant to law.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, December 20, 1950, he presented to the President of the United States the enrolled bill (S. 4234) to promote the foreign policy and provide for the defense and general welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LANGER:

S. 4269. A bill for the relief of certain alien refugees; and

S. 4270. A bill for the relief of certain alien refugees; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. YOUNG:

S. 4271. A bill for the relief of Mary Osadchy; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TYDINGS:

S. 4272. A bill for the relief of the city of Baltimore; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. KNOWLAND (for himself and Mr. NIXON):

S. 4273. A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to enlarge existing water supply facilities for the San Diego, Calif., area in order to insure the existence of an adequate water supply for naval installations and defense production plants in such area; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. LANGER:

S. 4274. A bill for the relief of Werner Otto Wenk; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PEPPER:

S. 4275. A bill for the relief of Victor Di Taranto and Gaetano Barletta; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REQUEST FOR NAMES OF FEDERAL JUDGES INCAPACITATED IN PERFORMANCE OF DUTIES

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I submit for appropriate reference a resolution, which reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts is requested to report to the Senate not later than January 15, 1951, the names of all judges of the United States district courts and United States Courts of Appeals who have not been able to perform their duties as judges because of disabilities or for other reasons for at least 6 months immediately prior to the date of such report and who are eligible for retirement.

The purpose of this resolution is to bolster up the efficiency of the all-important judicial branch of our Government. In these days, all of us, including every individual citizen in the country, is called upon to contribute his utmost so that our country may successfully meet the problems—the grave ones—confronting us today. We must as part of this effort see that the all-important purpose of the judiciary presented in our courts be shown prompt justice, because so often justice delayed is justice defeated.

It has come to my notice that there are several individuals holding judicial positions in our Federal courts who are no longer able to perform their duties—not through any fault of their own—but because of illness that will keep cases presented them from ever getting off their desks.

Mr. President, there is one thing about that, and that is that any such situation should be brought to light and that proper steps be taken to remedy them.

In introducing this resolution, I have not the slightest thought of impugning the integrity or the ability of those serving in judicial capacities. I have always thought that when they are no longer able to perform their duties prompt action should be taken that others may succeed to their positions.

The Federal judiciary is independent and should be, but it is the duty of the legislative branch of the Government to contribute its part by legislation and other ways, to see that proper appointments are made and that those who are no longer able to serve, avail themselves of the privilege of retirement, which I feel utter ample.

I might add that in the manner of human nature, many individuals are reluctant to give up their duties when the time comes that they are no longer able to perform them. The least we can do is to keep full account of the circumstances that we may be fully cognizant when such conditions arise.

It is with such a purpose that this resolution is submitted and I hope it will be adopted promptly.

The resolution (S. Res. 376) submitted by Mr. LANGER was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MRS. JUAN ANTONIO RIVERIA ET AL.—REQUEST FOR RETURN OF H. R. 5051

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 377) was read by the legislative clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be, and he is hereby, directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 5051) for the relief of Mrs. Juan Antonio Riveria, Mrs. Raul Valle Antelo, Mrs. Jorge Diaz Romero, Mrs. Otto Resse, and Mrs. Hugo Soria, together with the Senate engrossed amendments thereto.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, a few days ago, on the call of the Consent Calendar, the bill (H. R. 5051) was objected to by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON]. He agreed to permit the bill to pass, providing certain information was conveyed to him and his right to move for a reconsideration would not be curtailed. By some misadventure the bill was messaged to the House. This resolution merely calls for its return to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 377) was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 8881) to permit educational, religious, or charitable institutions to import textile machines and parts thereof for instructional purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

NOTICES OF MOTIONS TO SUSPEND THE RULE—AMENDMENTS

Mr. McKELLAR. In accordance with rule XL, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that it is my intention to move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 9920) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes, the following amendment, namely:

On page 1, after line 12, insert the following:

"PAYMENT OF SUMS DUE DECEASED CONGRESSIONAL PERSONNEL

"(a) Section 49 of the Revised Statutes is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 49. When any person dies while serving as a Member of or Delegate to Congress, as Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico, as an officer or employee of either the Senate or House of Representatives, or as an employee of a joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives, the appropriate disbursing officer of the Senate or House of Representatives shall pay to the widow or widower of such person, or, if there is no widow or widower, to the next of kin or heirs at law of such persons, any unpaid balance of salary or other sums due such person at the time of his death.'

"(b) Section 50 of the Revised Statutes is repealed."

Mr. McKELLAR also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 9920, making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

(For text of amendment referred to, see the foregoing notice.)

Mr. McKELLAR. In accordance with rule XL, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that it is my intention to move to suspend paragraph 4 of rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 9920) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes, the following amendment, namely:

On page 4, before the heading entitled "Chapter III," insert the following:

"MARITIME ACTIVITIES

"SHIP CONSTRUCTION

"The first proviso in the paragraph under the head 'United States Maritime Commission, ship construction' in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951, is hereby amended by striking out 'December 31, 1950' and inserting in lieu thereof 'June 30, 1951.'

"Appropriations and contract authority made available to the United States Maritime Commission for ship construction in the fiscal years 1950 and 1951, and in addition thereto $224,000,000 in contract authority, the totals of which, including not to exceed $500,000 which may be transferred to the appropriation 'Salaries and expenses' for necessary administrative costs without regard to limitations thereon in said appropriations, and including not to exceed $15,000,000 for the construction, activation, acquisition, and expansion of plants or facilities, on land whether owned by the Government or otherwise owned, shall be available, without regard to the provisions of the Merchant Marine Act of 1936 with respect to essential trade routes, for construction of such additional dry-cargo vessels as the Secretary of Commerce, with the approval of the President, shall find necessary for national security: Provided, That such additional vessels shall not be subject to the first proviso under the head 'New ship construction' in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1950, or the last provison under the head 'Ship construction' in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951.

"For the payment of obligations incurred on or after July 1, 1946, including obligations authorized herein, for ship construction, reconditioning and betterments, pursuant to the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, as amended, and to the authority granted under the head 'United Statess Maritime Commission' in the several appropriation acts for the fiscal years 1947, 1948, 1949, 1950, and 1951, the unexpended balance of funds heretofore appropriated for the liquidation of such obligations may be consolidated and may, in total, be available for the liquidation of such obligations.

"SALARIES AND EXPENSES

"Limitations under the head 'Salaries and expenses,' United States Maritime Commission in the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1951, are amended as follows: 'Maintenance of shipyard facilities' is increased from '$452,000' to '$483,000,' and 'Maintenance and operation of terminals' is decreased from '$765,000' to '$734,000.'"

Mr. McKELLAR also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 9920, making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1951, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

APPLICATION OF PRICE CEILINGS TO GRAINS

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. President, yesterday I challenged the statement by a nationally syndicated columnist that price ceilings could not be applied to grains under existing legislation, and I quoted Department of Agriculture statistics to prove that farm prices had not advanced unduly during the last year.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD, at the conclusion of my remarks, a United Press story carried in the New York Times of December 19, 1950. It is captioned "Slight drop noted in farmer income," and I believe it bears out what I had previously said, that agriculture is not sharing in the expanded national income which has resulted from price and wage increases since the outbreak of the Korean war. As a matter of fact, this newspaper article, based upon Department of Agriculture compilations, reveals that the gross income of American farmers for the first 11 months of 1950 was actually 1 percent below the figure for the same period in 1949.

While figures on net income of farmers during this same period are not available, it is certain that they will show a much sharper decline than do the gross income figures. On November 15 of this year the index of prices paid by farmers had reached the highest level in history. In other words, farmers were paying more than ever before for the goods and services which they must purchase to carry out their day-to-day farm operations. The prices of the commodities which farmers market have not advanced nearly enough to offset these mounting operating costs.

At best, farmers will have great difficulty in maintaining the high rate of production which they have achieved through hard work, increased mechanization, and improved farming practices. With the Nation embarking upon another gigantic defense program, and with thousands of farm youths scheduled for induction into the Armed Forces, we may soon face the most critical farm-labor shortage in our history. As steel and other metals are diverted to build planes, tanks, ships, and guns, it will become increasingly difficult for farmers to obtain machinery and machinery-repair parts. It is not too early for our top officials to outline a program under which agriculture will be assured an adequate labor supply and a continuing flow of machinery. If they fail to do this, farm production will inevitably slump from the record highs of the last 3 years, and food prices will just as inevitably skyrocket.

The American farmer, even today, is not receiving what Congress has decreed to be a fair price for most of his products, namely, parity. Except for a few farm commodities which are in short supply, agricultural products have lagged far behind both wages and other products in the upward price climb which began last June 24. If farmers were to follow the 40-hour workweek, as most workers in other industries do, food supplies would indeed become scarce, and the resultant prices so high that few people would have enough to eat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SLIGHT DROP NOTED IN FARMER INCOME—1 PERCENT DECLINE REPORTED FOR FIRST 11 MONTHS—TOBACCO, FRUIT RECEIPTS ARE HIGHER

WASHINGTON, December 18.—Farm income for the first 11 months of this year fell slightly below the same period last year, despite higher farm prices, the Department of Agriculture reported today.

A 1-percent drop in the farmer's return was attributed to smaller sales volume.

National farm income up to December 1 this year totaled $25,300,000,000, compared to $25,663,000,000 for the same period in 1949. Total farm income for 1950 still could reach last year's total of $28,127,000,000, but only if December marketings are exceptionally heavy.

The record high in farm income was established in 1948, when farmers pocketed $30,554,000,000.

Despite the over-all drop, farmers in nine States made more money during the first 11 months of 1950 than they did last year. The States are Michigan, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Montana, Colorado, Washington, Oregon, and California. Their marketings were as high or higher than last year.

Farm receipts from the sale of livestock and livestock products for the 11 months this year was $14,300,000,444, about the same as last year. The number of livestock that went to market was smaller, but price increases offset the decline in sales.

Crop sales during the period amounted to $11,000,000,000, 4 percent under 1949. While crops averaged slightly higher than last year, marketings were smaller.

Receipts from wheat, corn, cotton, and vegetables were reported especially low as compared to 1949 because of decreases in the volume marketed. On the other hand, receipts from tobacco and fruits were well above last year's level. The gain in tobacco receipts was attributed to an increase in sales. Fruit increases resulted from higher prices.

NOTICE OF INTENTION TO ADDRESS THE SENATE

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. President, I give notice, if I may, that as soon as I may obtain recognition after the convening of the Senate tomorrow at noon, I shall make some observations regarding the journey I recently made around the world, and upon aspects of our foreign policy.

WAR DAMAGE INSURANCE

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader. The House has passed what is commonly known as the so-called war damage bill, and the bill has been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate. The bill passed by the House is quite similar to the bill which was enacted during the last war. The House has passed the bill by a unanimous vote. I hesitate to call the Banking and Currency Committee together to consider and report the bill unless the Senate so desires. Many persons are inquiring to find out what the Senate is going to do about the bill. I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LUCAS] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. WHERRY], the two leaders, what their opinion is. If they feel as the House did about the bill, the committee can meet in the morning and can consider and report the bill. On the other hand, of course I appreciate the state of the calendar and the time requirements of the pending tax bill.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield for a discussion of the question raised by the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, inasmuch as the question asked by the Senator from South Carolina is addressed to the majority leader and to me, I should like to make a brief reply. Although the measure to which the Senator from South Carolina has referred is very important, I feel it does not have to be acted on at this special session. It will be only some 12 or 13 days before the new Congress convenes. While the bill is important, certainly it is not of an emergency type which requires handling by the Congress which now is in special session.

I respectfully submit to the majority leader that if we pass the tax bill and the appropriation bill and the bill giving the requested authority in respect to procurement contracts, the Senate will be kept fully at work at least until Saturday, and possibly until later than that.

So I beg of the Senator that even though the proposed legislation to which he refers is important, and even though I appreciate the fact that the bill was passed unanimously by the House, yet he should remember that many of the Members of the House already are on their way home, feeling that their work has been completed.

Mr. MAYBANK. One reason why I asked the question is that various Members of the House of Representatives have asked me about this measure. The chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, Representative SPENCE, and various representatives of business throughout the country continually are calling the Senate Banking and Currency Committee to find out what we are going to do about the bill. There is no use in having a meeting of the committee to report the bill to the Senate unless the Senate is going to act on it.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. It seems to me that in connection with the bill referred to by the Senator from South Carolina there should be a full examination of the experience had during the war. At the time there was a dispute as to the program and as to whether the people in the interior should have to pay the same rate as that paid by the people living on the coast, and whether the program should cover the islands of the Pacific, and to what extent, and whether it should cover the mandated islands.

It seems to me those questions require some examination, and that a rather thorough study should be made by the committee. I do not believe there is time to do so at this session.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. CAPEHART. I agree with what the able Senator from Ohio and the able Senator from Nebraska have just said; but I wish to say that I can think of nothing more important for the Senate to do than to pass the war-damage insurance bill. It should be brought to the floor of the Senate, and the Senate should pass it in the same form in which the similar bill was enacted during World War II, because the people of the Nation are entitled to war-risk protection. We are at war.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if this matter is to be debated, I shall have to request the regular order.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I should like to make just one further statement, if the Senator will permit.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] is a member of the Banking and Currency Committee, and he knows that we are receiving many requests from various parts of the country in regard to taking action on this measure.

Mr. CAPEHART. I agree that it should be amended, and that we can amend it at the coming session. However, we should do for our people something along the line the bill proposes.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; since the matter has been debated this long.

Mr. LUCAS. If this measure is so important as the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Indiana contend that it is, I think the Banking and Currency Committee should meet and should report the bill, regardless of whether it is passed at this session. It should go to the calendar, and I am satisfied that if it reaches the calendar, we probably shall pass it. We must remember that when the Congress convenes on January 3, it will not immediately begin to pass proposed legislation.

Mr. MAYBANK. That is my thought.

Mr. LUCAS. When the present session ends, every measure remaining unacted upon will be swept from the board, and in the next Congress it will be necessary to begin all over again. Following January 3, it probably will be a number of weeks before this bill is reached.

Mr. MAYBANK. And it will be necessary to begin all over again with it in the House of Representatives.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me, so that I may ask a question of the majority leader?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. WHERRY. The statement I made a moment ago was made on the premise that we shall end the present session by the coming Saturday night. Of course, if we are to remain in session following this week, hearings can be held on the bill to which the Senator from South Carolina has referred. I am not now discussing the merits or the demerits of the bill; but there are many amendments which have been suggested to it. My feeling is that if we are to leave here by Saturday night, it will be impossible for us to handle the bill. However, if we are to be in session next week, the situation will be different.

Mr. MAYBANK. Then, Mr. President, I shall have the committee meet tomorrow and consider the bill and prepare to report it. Hearings will be held if necessary.

CONSIDERATION OF NOMINATIONS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will further yield——

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I should like to make a brief statement in regard to the executive calendar. I understand that the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg is ready to be presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the nomination was reported to the Senate yesterday.

Mr. LUCAS. I had understood that either it had already been reported or was to be reported today.

I understand that sometime late in the afternoon, after we complete debate on the tax bill, we shall proceed to consider the nominations of both Anna M. Rosenberg, who has been nominated to be Assistant Secretary of Defense, and Stephen J. Spingarn, who has been nominated to be a member of the Federal Trade Commission. Both those nominations have been objected to heretofore.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, for many days the minority members have not objected to confirmation of the nomination of Miss Anna M. Rosenberg. For a day or so after the nomination came up, we did ask that the nomination go over. However, when the nomination was recommitted and was further considered by the committee, it was agreeable to us to wait and to abide by the report.

I wish to tell the distinguished majority leader that I am quite sure the minority have no objection to the consideration of either of the nominations which have been passed over.

However, the Senator from North Dakota served notice that when nominations came up, in view of the fact that apparently there are no North Dakota residents in the diplomatic service, he would object to some of the nominations and would give the Senate his advice in respect to the appointment of residents of North Dakota to positions in the diplomatic service. So I suggest to the Senator that when the executive calendar is reached, he allow sufficient time, at least, for the Senator from North Dakota to submit his observations.

PRICE AND WAGE CONTROL

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me for a minute, to permit me to make a brief observation?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield for 1 minute, but then I must ask for the regular order.

Mr. CAPEHART. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, about 3 months ago the Congress passed the Defense Production Act, a measure designed to control prices, wages, and many other things. At the present time, the administration is putting into effect many of the provisions of that act. However, in my personal opinion the administration is violating not only the law but the intent of the law, because the administration recently froze the price of automobiles as of December 1, but failed to freeze wages.

I wish to call attention to the fact that section 401, paragraph 3, of the Defense Production Act provides—and I shall read exactly what the provision is:

> Whenever a ceiling has been imposed with respect to a particular material or service, the President shall stabilize wages, salaries, and other compensation in the industry or business producing the material or performing the service.

Now the President has frozen the price of automobiles as of December 1, but so far he has failed to freeze wages in that industry. In my opinion, we are getting off to a bad start with respect to that law, in that the administration already has violated the law or the intent of Congress in respect to it.

As a member of the Banking and Currency Committee which spent so many days and nights on the bill, I felt that I should call this matter to the attention of the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3357) to prohibit transportation of gambling devices in interstate and foreign commerce.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9272) to amend the act of October 5, 1949 (Public Law 32, 81st Cong.), so as to extend the time of permits covering lands located on the Agua Caliente Indian Reservation.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 4234. An act to promote the foreign policy and provide for the defense and general welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia;

H. R. 9913. An act to prevent penalties and additions to tax in case of failure to meet requirements with respect to estimated tax by reason of increases imposed by the Revenue Act of 1950; and

H. J. Res. 554. Joint resolution amending section 3804 of the Internal Revenue Code.

EXCESS PROFITS TAX ACT OF 1950

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9827) to provide revenue by imposing a corporate excess-profits tax, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this tax bill is presented in response to the mandate contained in the Revenue Act of 1950, requiring the Committee on Finance to report a corporate excess-profits tax as early as practicable during the Eighty-first Congress, after November 15, 1950.

In order to comply with this mandate and report an excess-profits tax as early as possible, the Senate Committee on Finance began hearings on the excess-profits-tax bill on Monday, December 4, 1950, while the bill still was being debated in the House. Only by sitting for long hours and under severe pressure has your committee been able to report the bill at this time.

An excess-profits-tax bill is not the type of bill which can be handled quickly. Too many difficult problems are inherent in this type of tax. The treatment of new corporations, the effect of such a tax upon growing and expanding businesses, and the need of relief for corporations with inadequate credits are all factors which must be considered in framing an excess-profits-tax law. These problems are much more difficult under present conditions than in the case of an economy which has been fully mobilized for war. Moreover, they are also much more important under present conditions than in the case of a full-scale war. The present emergency is likely to be of long duration, and as a result, the relief provisions must be adequate if further business expansion is not to be stopped altogether.

The committee has approached these problems from a twofold point of view. An attempt has been made to provide solutions for the more important types of cases involving inadequate excess-profits credits. However, at the same time, it has also been recognized that it is necessary to secure sizable additional revenue to aid in meeting the rising costs of our military program. This latter factor, of course, has made it necessary to moderate the relief provisions more than might otherwise be desirable.

REVENUE EFFECTS

It is estimated that your committee's bill will yield $3,200,000,000 in a full year of operation with corporate profits at the level existing in the calendar year 1950. The House bill, under similar assumptions as to corporate profits, would yield about $3,000,000,000. It is believed that with such a level of corporate profits an excess-profits tax would be imposed on about 70,000 of the 400,000 taxable corporations.

Corporate profits in the last half of 1950 are running at an annual rate considerably in excess of $40,000,000,000. If this trend continues into 1951, your committee's bill may reasonably be expected to result in an increase in corporate tax liabilities of between four and five billion dollars.

On that particular point, Mr. President, let me say to the Senate that, from direct taxes on individuals, under present law and for a full year's operation, the Treasury will receive $20,700,000,000. Under the House bill it will receive the same amount, and under the Senate bill it will also receive the same amount, because we are not dealing with individual rates in this bill. From direct taxes on corporations, the Treasury will receive, under the present law, $16,200,000,000; under the House bill, $19,300,000,000; and under the Senate finance bill, as reported, $19,400,000,000. From excise and miscellaneous taxes, the Treasury will receive under the present law, under the House bill, and under the Senate bill—because they are not affected by this bill—$8,200,000,000 per year and from net employment taxes $800,000,000 per year. If we add to these the average rate of import duties collected and miscellaneous receipts, which may or may not continue, under war conditions, we would add about $2,000,000,000 more to these receipts, and the total figures would stand as follows: Under the present law, a total of $47,900,000,000; under the House bill, a total of $51,000,000,000; and under the Senate Finance Committee bill, a total of $51,100,000,000. Those are impressive figures, I think, showing the total tax liability under the present law and under the law as we propose to amend it in this bill. Of course, that takes into consideration only Federal tax liability, and does not touch State, county, municipal, or any local taxing subdivisions.

The estimated tax liabilities appear in the following table:

Comparison between the estimated tax liabilities[1] on a full-year basis, present law, House bill and Senate Finance Committee bill

[In billions of dollars]

	Present law	House bill	Senate Finance Committee bill
Direct taxes on individuals[2]	20.7	20.7	20.7
Direct taxes on corporations	16.2	19.3	19.4
Excise and miscellaneous taxes	8.2	8.2	8.2
Net employment taxes	.8	.8	.8
Total	45.9	49.0	49.1

[1] After the 1950 Revenue Act and the House bill or the Senate Finance Committee bill become fully effective.
[2] Includes estate and gift taxes.

NOTE.—The above figures differ from collections in that they do not reflect receipts from customs and miscellaneous receipts which approximate $2,000,000,000.

THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX RATE

Under the House bill, corporations are subject to an excess-profits tax of 30 percent of their excess profits. This makes the total rate, including normal and surtax, 75 percent on the taxable excess profits. However, the House bill had a provision fixing an over-all tax ceiling. Under this ceiling, the total tax, including normal and surtax, could in no case exceed 67 percent of the taxpayer's total income.

Under your committee's bill, the additional rate of 30 percent on excess profits is retained. However, because for 1951 and subsequent years, your committee bill provides for an additional increase in the surtax of two percentage points, the total rate on taxable excess profits is 77 percent as compared to 75 percent under the House bill.

Because of the difficulty of devising adequate relief measures, your committee believes that the over-all ceiling rate to be applied to a taxpayer's total income should not exceed 60 percent as compared to 67 percent, under the House bill.

The over-all effective tax-rate limitation of 60 percent under your committee's bill will not affect any corporation whose income in the tax year is less than 182 percent of its excess-profits credit. The ceiling will benefit small- and middle-sized corporations with inadequate credits under the bill. It will have very little, if any, effect upon the larger corporations.

TWO PERCENT SURTAX INCREASE

Your committee's bill increases the surtax rate by two percentage points effective with respect to taxable years beginning on and after July 1, 1950. This increase is not retroactive and will not apply to the calendar year 1950. Your committee believed it wise to bring the bill in line with the revenue estimates under the House bill, and concluded that a 2-percent increase in the surtax rate, which applies only to corporations with income of over $25,000, was justifiable in the light of expanding Government costs.

The 2-percentage-point increase in the surtax rate affects about 100,000 corporations, and increases their tax liability by about $600,000,000. It increases the surtax on about 30,000 corporations whose tax liabilities were not affected by the House bill.

THE COMPUTATION OF THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX

Both the House bill and the Finance Committee bill permit the taxpayer to use either average earnings or invested capital in arriving at a proper measure of normal profits for excess-profits-tax purposes. The base period selected for the earnings credit consists of the years 1946 to 1949, inclusive. The taxpayer is given the option to select three out of four of such years. In addition to eliminating 1 year in the base period, the taxpayer is permitted to count any deficit year in the base period as zero. For example, if a taxpayer has two or more deficit years in the base period, it can eliminate one and count the remaining deficit years as zero. In addition, the average earnings credit may be increased by 12 percent of the net capital additions, including one-half of the net additions in 1948 and all of the net additions in 1949. The 12-percent rate of return allowed on capital net additions applies whether the net capital addition takes the form of equity capital, borrowed capital, or retained earnings. Under the House bill, a lesser return was allowed on borrowed capital.

RELIEF FOR SMALL CORPORATIONS

The committee's bill provides for a minimum credit of $25,000 for small corporations. This credit enables any taxpayer to have an excess-profits-tax net income up to $25,000 without being subject to the excess-profits tax. If the credit otherwise computed is less than $25,000, the taxpayer is permitted to raise his credit to that amount. However, the $25,000 credit will not apply if the credit otherwise allowed is more than that amount. This is distinguishable from the specific exemption of $10,000 under the World War II statute, which was an additional allowance to all corporations regardless of the size of their excess-profits credits.

TERMINATION OF EXCESS PROFITS TAX

The committee believed it desirable to terminate the excess-profits tax as of December 31, 1952, in order to give assurance that the tax would be thoroughly reviewed in the not too distant future. There was no termination date in the House bill.

On that point, Mr. President, I wish to emphasize that the committee anticipates that the act will be renewed, but inasmuch as the bill has been produced under extreme pressure and by working the staff of both the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, and the Treasury, overtime, day and night, for many days, it would be anticipated that there would be errors in the bill which should be corrected by a rewriting of this bill.

INVESTED CAPITAL CREDIT

For many taxpayers, "average earnings" for the period 1946 to 1949 is not a fair measure of normal earnings. Both the committee bill and the House bill permit an alternative credit measured by a certain percentage of invested capital.

The committee bill allows the following rates of return on invested capital:

Capital to which rate applies	Rates under Finance Committee bill	Rates under World War II law
	Percent	Percent
Under $5,000,000	12	8
$5,000,000 to $10,000,000	10	6
Over $10,000,000	8	5

I may say, Mr. President, in passing, that on these rates there was no controversy, as the committee understood, between the House, the Treasury, and the Members of the Finance Committee.

These rates are the same as those under the House bill, except in the case of borrowed capital. Under the committee's bill the rates on borrowed capital are the same as the rates on equity capital and retained earnings. The House bill used a formula which produced a lesser rate on borrowed capital.

The method of determining invested capital under the House bill was retained. In general, this was determined by deducting from the tax basis of assets on the corporate books at the end of the base period the total of the liabilities plus any "recent loss adjustment." The "recent loss adjustment" permits a net deficit for either the total years 1946 to 1949 or the total years 1940 to 1949 to be added to the net assets.

There were some taxpayers who felt that the "asset approach" for determining invested capital used in the House bill was less equitable than the historical approach in effect during World War II. The committee believed that taxpayers, if they so desire, should be permitted to determine their invested capital under the historical method, and the bill gives them an election so to do.

In the case of insurance companies other than life, the committee amended the bill to provide that 50 percent of their reserves should be counted as borrowed capital in computing the invested capital base.

AVERAGE EARNINGS CREDIT

For the purpose of providing a yardstick of normal earnings, the bill provides that the base period shall be the 4 years 1946 to 1949, which was a relatively favorable period for business generally. After the taxpayer eliminates its poorest year in this period, the earnings of the remaining 3 years are adjusted in a manner described subsequently and averaged. The resulting average base period net income is then reduced by 15 percent for the purpose of determining the excess-profits credit.

It was necessary to select the period 1946 to 1949 instead of the period 1936 to 1939, which was used in the World War II law, because of the great number of businesses which have started during and after the last war. Furthermore, many of the businesses which were in existence during the prior base period have substantially changed their character since that time.

The committee recognized, however, that the 1946 to 1949 period was one of unusual business prosperity due in large part to the deferred demands and accumulated savings of World War II and to the high level of military expenditures which was maintained throughout those years. Since this unprecedented level of business activity could hardly have been expected to continue permanently, the use of the income of the years 1946 through 1949, without adjustment, would produce a general overstatement of the taxpayers' earning capacity in the absence of hostilities in Korea and the large military program. For these reasons the bill provides a moderate 15 percent cutback in the average base-period net income.

The bill also provides for several adjustments to base-period earnings which would minimize hardship in the case of individual taxpayers. As already mentioned, the taxpayer is required to eliminate his poorest year during the base period. This provision would prove of great benefit to corporations which experienced temporary low earnings due to reconversion or other causes during the postwar years.

Although the base period generally is the four calendar years 1946 through 1949, taxpayers using fiscal years ending between December 31 and April 1 will use the last four taxable years ending prior to April 1, 1950. It is desirable to permit taxpayers to use their own taxable years insofar as possible, and the first quarter of 1950 did not include or border upon the months affected by the Korean hostilities. On the other hand, fiscal year taxpayers whose taxable years end after March 31 are required to use as their base period the four calendar years 1946 through 1949. This is accomplished by prorating the earnings of their fiscal years which begin and end within this period.

NET INCOME FOR EXCESS-PROFITS-TAX PURPOSES

The bill provides that the income to which the excess-profits tax is to be applied is to be the income which is subject to the ordinary income tax, adjusted in order to remove the effect of certain types of income and deductions, which are of a sporadic and unusual nature and which, therefore, do not provide a fair measure of the taxpayer's true excess profits. Both this bill and the House bill follow the pattern of the World War II law in this respect. However, your committee's bill makes certain changes in the adjustments provided by the House.

Unlike the House bill, net losses on the sale or exchange of assets used in a trade or business are not excluded from excess profits net income; net gains from such sales or exchanges are, however, excluded as in the House bill.

If the taxpayer has elected to use the invested capital base, the interest deduction with respect to borrowed capital is excluded. This change from the House bill is required by the provision of the bill which provides for the inclusion of 100 percent of borrowed capital in invested capital.

The bill provides a larger exemption than does the House bill with respect to the income from coal, iron, and timber properties which were not in operation during the base period, and extends this type of relief to new or revived metal mines and to new natural-gas properties. Moreover, the bill provides this same treatment for metal mines which had an aggregate loss during the 1946–49 period. Your committee believed that these changes were essential in order to encourage the development of these natural resources at this time.

The bill permits taxpayers using the installment method of accounting for income-tax purposes to elect to report their income on the accrual basis for the excess-profits tax. While the House bill permitted this election only to taxpayers receiving income from installment sales, your committee's bill extends the same option to taxpayers whose principal business is the purchasing of installment sales obligations. This extension is required in order to prevent discrimination against the latter class of taxpayers.

Except for certain minor technical changes, the bill conforms to the other provisions of the House bill relating to the computation of excess-profits net income. These include provisions concerning long- and short-term capital gains and losses, casualty losses, income from the retirement or repurchase of bonds, income from the recovery of bad debts, refunds of processing taxes, contributions by life-insurance companies to policyholders' reserves, payments by the Government to encourage development of mineral resources, the credit for dividends received from domestic corporations, the reallocation of abnormal income arising from work done in other years, payments under long-term contracts, certain railroad leases, bad-debt reserves of banks, and blocked income in foreign countries.

The bill makes many comparable adjustments to base-period net income. In general, where a certain type of income or deduction is excluded from excess-profits net income, the same type of exclusion is provided with respect to the income of the base years. The committee bill follows, in general outline, the House bill with respect to such adjustments.

However, your committee's bill permits an additional adjustment with respect to the assessments paid by banks during the base-period years to the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. It is anticipated that such assessments will be considerably less than those paid during the base-period years, and for this reason the bill provides that the deduction for FDIC assessments in the base years will be reduced proportionately.

LOSS CARRYOVERS AND UNUSED CREDIT CARRYOVERS

The net operating loss carryovers of the ordinary income tax are also applicable for excess-profits-tax purposes. Losses in 1950 and later years may be carried forward for 5 years. Losses in 1948 and 1949 may be carried forward for only 2 years. However, your committee has added a provision which permits a taxpayer using the earnings credit to elect to carry forward to 1950 and 1951 losses during the base period which have not otherwise been offset.

The bill permits the unused portion of an excess-profits credit to be carried back against the prevous year and to be carried forward for 5 years—the same carryover period as is provided for net operating losses.

GENERAL RELIEF PROVISIONS

Because of the high rate used under an excess-profits tax it is necessary to be unusually careful in defining the base upon which the rate is imposed, so as to avoid inequities and discriminations which might be tolerable if the rate used were low. After all the general adjustments have been made to the taxpayer's credit and taxable income, there would undoubtedly be a considerable number of hardship cases. Therefore, the bill, like the World War II law, contains a series of provisions designed to adjust for abnormalities in the experience of individual taxpayers. However, the general approach taken in the bill is substantially different from that used in the World War II law.

The latter dealt with this problem under the well-known section 722. The general approach used was to construct a hypothetical base-period earnings experience for the individual taxpayer who qualified for relief. In general, relief was provided when the taxpayer experienced an adversity during the base period, made changes in its business during the base period which affected its potential earning power substantially, or was not in existence during the base period and could not obtain an equitable basis under the invested-capital method. Taxpayers who could demonstrate that they fell within the general categories set out in section 722 were required to base their claim for relief upon evidence of what their income would have been in the absence of the event or condition which formed the basis for relief.

Section 722 had the appearance of providing relief in true hardship cases and in many instances it was not difficult for a taxpayer's representative to convince themselves that it was eligible under the section. The result was a very large number of claims for relief. However, the attempt to prove the effect of the abnormality upon the taxpayer's earnings experience during the base period proved to be extremely difficult. The work of processing the claims went very slowly and in 1946 the dissatisfaction expressed by taxpayers caused the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue

Taxation to hold hearings at which their grievances were aired. At that time the representatives of the Bureau of Internal Revenue came forward with a proposal to transfer the work on 722 cases to a specialized group of agents working under what came to be known as the Excess Profits Tax Council. It was the opinion of many at that time that the fundamental difficulty was not with section 722 itself, but the manner in which it was being administered. It was hoped that the administrative reorganization attending the establishment of the Excess Profits Tax Council would expedite the processing of the claims and the attainment of more generally satisfactory results. While a large number of claims were subsequently disposed of, many, including some of the most important and the most difficult claims, still remain unsettled and about 600 cases have been appealed from the Excess Profits Tax Council to the Tax Court.

Although section 722 held out the promise of equitable results, the expense, trouble, and delays attendant upon the settlement of claims resulted in many cases in little or no relief to the taxpayer. Moreover, a growing awareness of the difficulty of obtaining relief discouraged the prosecution of claims by many small taxpayers. The complaint arose that relief under the section 722 was available only to the comparatively large and well financed corporations.

The relief sections contained in this bill are based upon the idea that it is better to provide a less perfect adjustment quickly under a prescribed formula than to strive for a more refined result and risk all the pitfalls which the 722 approach involves.

(A) ABNORMALITIES

For instance, a taxpayer which has in one of its three best base-period years an abnormality such as a fire, strike, flood, or price war having a substantial effect upon its income, is given the option to substitute for the income of the abnormal year the rate of return for its industry in that year applied to its total assets for the last day of the year. Taxpayers having more than one abnormal year may substitute for their entire base-period-earnings experience an average base-period net income determined by multiplying the average rate of return for the taxpayer's industry by the taxpayer's average assets during the base period.

Thus the amount of relief available is prescribed by a formula, and qualification for relief depends only upon the establishment of the existence of the abnormality and compliance with a test which determines whether or not the effect of the abnormality on income was substantial. Hence the area which remains for administrative judgment is comparatively small.

(B) NEW PRODUCTS

The bill also provides a relief formula for a taxpayer which has made substantial changes in its products or services during the last 3 years of its base period. The formula is available if a taxpayer, which introduces one or more new products or services, can show that (a) by the end of the third year or earlier following the year in which the products or services were introduced, the gross income from such products was more than 40 percent of the taxpayer's total gross income, and (b) that its net income in any one of the taxable years in which it has met the percentage of gross income test was in excess of 125 percent of the average excess-profits net income during the base-period year or years preceding the first change in product or service used in qualifying under the gross-income test.

Taxpayers qualifying under the new-product test may substitute for their base-period earnings experience an average base-period net income calculated by multiplying the industry average rate of return for the taxpayer's industry by the taxpayer's total assets for the last day of the earliest year in which the taxpayer qualifies for relief or the last day of its base period if this is an earlier date.

(C) CHANGES IN CAPACITY

A similar relief measure is provided for taxpayers which made substantial changes in their productive capacity during the base period. Such taxpayers are given the option to use an average base-period net income calculated by multiplying the base-period rate of return for the taxpayer's industry by the taxpayer's assets at the close of its base period. The taxpayer may qualify for this relief by showing an increase of 100 percent or more in its productive capacity by the close of the base period. Alternatively, it may show an increase of 50 percent or more in its productive capacity and an increase of 50 percent or more in the adjusted basis of the taxpayer's total facilities. For the taxpayer who has difficulty in measuring changes in productive capacity, a third test is provided which is based exclusively upon a change in the value of its facilities. To qualify under this test, the unadjusted basis of the taxpayer's total facilities after the change in its plant or equipment occurs must exceed by 100 percent or more the unadjusted basis of the facilities prior to that time.

(D) DEPRESSED INDUSTRIES

A somewhat different type of relief is provided for the taxpayer whose industry was depressed during the base period. In these cases the industry average rate of return during the base period is not an appropriate method of providing relief, since the average reflects the depression in the industry. Therefore, the qualified taxpayer is permitted an average base-period net income calculated by applying 80 percent of the rate of return earned by the taxpayer's industry during the period 1936 through 1949 to its average total assets during the base period. It should be borne in mind that this type of relief is available only if the taxpayer's industry is depressed.

The depressed industries relief is available when the average rate of return of the industry during the base period is less than 60 percent of its average for the period 1936 through 1949. The 60 percent test is a rigorous one, since, generally speaking, profits were higher in the base-period years than over the period 1936 through 1949.

The classification of industries used in relief cases based on abnormalities, new products, or changes in capacity is set up on a comparatively broad basis and is shown in both the bill and the committee report. A Government document is now available which will assist the taxpayer in determining the industry in which he belongs. He is a part of that industry in which he obtains the largest percentage of his gross receipts.

The industry average rates of return will be computed from data regularly compiled from income-tax returns in preparing the Treasury Department's Statistics of Income. Tentative rates will be proclaimed on or before March 1, 1951, and final rates will be released at a later date, when the 1949 data have been completed.

The classification of industries used for the purposes of depressed industry relief is somewhat more refined. The existence of such industries and the appropriate rates of return will also be announced by the Treasury Department. A taxpayer will be regarded as a member of a depressed industry only if more than 50 percent of its gross receipts are obtained in that industry.

The formula used in providing relief in abnormality cases is simpler and less erratic than the one contained in the House bill and can be applied where all of the taxpayer's years are abnormal, which was not possible under the House formula.

The relief provision for increased capacity does not appear in the House bill nor does the depressed-industry provision. Testimony at the committee's hearings indicated that both provisions were necessary.

NEW CORPORATIONS

Corporations formed after the beginning of the base period usually do not have an opportunity to develop an adequate base-period earnings credit. Since the invested-capital credit is merely intended to be a floor, and since there are industries in which invested capital is a small element in earning capacity, some special rule for new corporations is obviously required.

Under the bill a corporation which commenced business at any time after the beginning of the base period may use as an alternate basis an amount determined by applying the average base-period rate of return for the taxpayer's total assets. If the taxpayer's first 3 years end in the base period, the rate is applied to the taxpayer's total assets at the close of the base period. When the taxpayer's first, second, or third taxable year ends after the base period, the credit for each of these years is determined by applying the industry's base-period rate of return to the taxpayer's total assets at the end of each of these years. For subsequent years the credit will be the same as that calculated for the third year, adjusted for subsequent additions to capital.

The basic assumption used in this formula is that under the forced-draft conditions of today, new corporations will approximate or attain maturity by the end of the third year after they commence business.

The measure of relief provided for new corporations is similar to that given an old corporation introducing new products or services which bring about a substantial change in the character of its business.

The committee has amended the House bill so as to prevent the use of the new corporation option in cases where assets are transferred from one corporation to another in order to obtain the benefits of higher industry rate of return.

GROWING CORPORATIONS

Corporations which experience an unusually rapid growth during the base period also present a special problem, because their base-period experience is clearly unrepresentative of their normal earning capacity.

The bill provides that corporations which qualify under certain well-defined tests have the option to elect a substitute average base-period net income based on (a) their earnings in 1949, or (b) their average earnings in 1948 and 1949, or (c) the average of half their earnings in 1949 and 40 percent of their earnings in 1950.

The House bill contained only the first two of these options. The third was added because it was clear from the testimony at the hearings that in certain cases the House options would not provide adequate relief.

To qualify for the growth options, a corporation must have been in existence at the beginning of the base period and show that its total payrolls in the last half of its base period were 130 percent or more of its payrolls in the first half, or that its gross receipts during the last half of the base period were more than 150 percent of the total during the first half.

The benefits of the growth options have been denied to corporations which had assets of not more than $20,000,000 at the beginning of the base period. This limit will exclude large, well-established businesses, which presumably do not require special treatment.

The committee is aware of certain additional problems which are not resolved by the growth options contained in the bill, and, pursuant to instructions from the committee, a floor amendment to this section of the bill will be presented at the appropriate time.

REGULATED PUBLIC UTILITIES

The committee has recognized the special problems of the regulated public utilities under an excess-profits tax. Normally, a public utility whose rates are regulated so as to limit its profits to a fair return on its investment will not have profits which are excess. In fact there is more likely to be a tendency for utility rates to lag behind increases in costs during a period when there are excess profits for industry in general. An excess-profits tax which arbitrarily applied the same standards of excess profits to the regulated public utilities as are applied to unregulated businesses would inevitably have the consequence of taxing away a part of the return which the utility commissions have decided is reasonable and necessary.

To meet this special problem of the regulated public utilities, the bill provides a credit for, first, electric, gas, and water utilities; second, streetcar and trackless trolley systems; third, municipal and suburban bus systems; fourth, bus and truck transportation; fifth, transportation of gas by pipeline; sixth, transportation of petroleum products by pipeline, and seventh, transportation by railroad; which is the sum of the ordinary income taxes they pay plus a rate of 6 percent on their total capital—other than inadmissible assets.

The amount of this credit is reduced by the amount of their interest deduction, since they are allowed the interest deduction in computing excess-profits net income. A credit computed in the same manner, but allowing a rate of return of 7 percent on total capital, is provided for telephone and telegraph utilities and common carrier airlines subject to the jurisdiction of the Civil Aeronautics Board.

These rates of return differ from the rates provided in the House bill in that the rate for railroads has been raised from 5 percent to 6 percent. The rate for telephone and telegraph has been raised from 6 percent to 7 percent, and the rate on transportation by air has been raised from 5 percent to 7 percent.

The committee has added a provision for a credit based on a 6-percent rate of return in the case of regulated bus and truck utilities.

The provision in the House bill with respect to the transportation of oil by pipeline has been clarified to read "transportation of oil or other petroleum products by pipeline."

Your committee's amendment specifically provides that in a case where only some of the members of an affiliated group eligible to file a consolidated return are regulated public utilities, the regulated utilities may file a consolidated return separate from the other members of the affiliated group.

The committee amendment also provides that a utility may qualify as a regulated utility if 80 percent or more of its gross income is from regulated sources. Since many public-utility systems are not regulated as to rates in part of the territory within their service area, the committee amendment provides that a utility of this type shall be considered regulated as to rates if the whole system is interconnected and coordinated so that the regulation to which it is subject has the effect of controlling the rates charged in the unregulated portions of its service area.

Under the House bill the rate of return for purposes of the excess-profits-tax credit was calculated only on the tax basis of the assets held by the utilities. In fact, however, the fair rates of return set by the regulatory authorities are not calculated on the tax basis of the assets of the utilities, but are based, instead, on their corporate books of account. These books are maintained in accordance with systems of accounts prescribed by the regulatory authorities or are maintained in accordance with the uniform systems of accounts prescribed by the Federal Power Commission or the National Association of Railway and Utility Commissioners. Consequently, an excess-profits-tax credit computed by applying a rate of return to the tax basis of assets would, in many cases, result in treating as excess profits the earnings which the appropriate regulatory authories have determined to be fair and normal. To correct this your committee's amendment permits the electric, gas, and water utilities, the streetcar, trackless trolley, and bus systems, the common carriers of gas by pipeline, and the telephone and telegraph utilities to compute their rate of return for purposes of the credit on either the tax basis of their assets or on the basis of their average outstanding common and preferred capital stock accounts and capital surplus and earned surplus accounts, as recorded on their corporate books of account.

MINERALS

The World War II excess-profits-tax law provided an exemption for income from the mining of certain specific strategic minerals. These were minerals which were essential to the military effort and were not normally produced in quantity in the United States. The House bill provided an exemption for these same minerals and included a number of additional strategic minerals. The new minerals were added to the strategic list after consultation with the National Security Resources Board. Your committee has added molybdenum to the strategic list because of its vital importance to our defense effort.

In order to keep the list of strategic minerals current with defense demands, the House bill provided for the certification of additional strategic minerals by the agency created to carry out section 303 (a) of the Defense Production Act of 1950. Your committee has retained this provision in the bill, but has amended the bill to strike out a provision which gave this agency the authority to certify minerals which are not so strategic as they are critical. Under the House bill, income from mining these critical minerals would be entirely exempt from excess-profits tax where it was obtained from the operation of new mines, or mines which were closed down at the time of the Korean invasion, or mines which operated at an over-all loss during 1946, 1947, 1948, and 1949. Your committee believed that this provision was too broad and would result in exemption of income in many cases where such an exemption was not necessary. It was felt that increased output of minerals which were not strategic but were merely critical could be encouraged through subsidies or bonus payments more effectively and at less cost than through excess-profits-tax exemption.

It was felt by your committee that, except for the special case of the strategic minerals, fair treatment of mineral producers under the excess-profits tax could be achieved by applying the principles of the World War II excess-profits tax. The old law provided that, where output exceeded normal output, a certain portion of the income from the increased output would be exempt. This provision applied to certain mining, timber, and natural-gas properties, and it gave recognition to the fact that these types of properties are wasting assets, so that their excessive depletion during the period of an excess-profits tax would, in some cases, result in an unfair tax burden.

Your committee's bill contains the provision of the House bill that, in the case of coal and iron mines, timber properties, and natural-gas properties, the exempt portion of their income is determined by multiplying current excess production by one-half of the current net income per unit.

The House bill also provided—as did the World War II law—that one-sixth of the net income of coal and iron mines and timber properties not in operation during the base period should be exempt. To encourage the production of metals for the emergency from new properties and from old properties which were not in operation during the base period this provision has been extended to such metal mines, and also to metal mines which operated at an aggregate loss during the base period. Income from natural-gas properties not in operation during the base period is also included. To increase the incentive for new production the exemption has been increased from one-sixth to one-third of the net income. Also, your committee's bill excludes amounts paid by the United States or any of its agencies for the encouragement of exploration, development, or the mining of critical and strategical minerals or metals.

FOREIGN CORPORATIONS

Your committee's bill, like the House bill, provides an exemption from the excess-profits tax for nonresident foreign corporations, as was done under the World War II law. These corporations are subject to a 30-percent gross income tax in lieu of the ordinary corporate income tax. Resident foreign corporations are subject to the excess-profits tax, as they were during World War II.

WESTERN HEMISPHERE TRADE CORPORATIONS

This bill, like the World War II law, provides an exemption from excess profits tax for domestic corporations where 95 percent of their income for the last 3 years is from outside the United States and 50 percent of their gross income is from an active trade or business. These corporations are principally the Western Hemisphere trade corporations, which receive special treatment under the ordinary income-tax laws.

The consolidated return provisions in the House bill have been amended by your committee so as to permit Western Hemisphere trade corporations a new election, for taxable years ending after June 30, 1950, to file separate returns and thus receive the excess profits tax exemption described above.

FOREIGN DIVIDENDS

Under the World War II law, dividends of foreign corporations were subject to excess-profits tax where the taxpayer used the earnings credit, but were not subject to excess-profits tax where the taxpayer used the invested capital credit. This treatment of the earnings credit taxpayer had the effect of discouraging the payment of foreign dividends where they could be deferred until after the termination of the excess-profits tax. Under the House bill and under the committee bill, foreign dividends are treated like dividends of domestic corporations in the case of both the earnings credit and the invested capital credit; that is, they are excluded from excess-profits net income in the base period and in the tax period, and stock in a foreign corporation is treated as an inadmissible asset.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I should like to ask if there is anything in the bill which would affect speculative profits made by foreigners trading on the United States commodity exchanges.

Mr. GEORGE. There is nothing in the bill with respect to that problem. That was dealt with in the Tax Act of 1950.

Mr. AIKEN. That is the law which was enacted about the 1st of last September, is it not?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; but it is not dealt with in this bill.

BLOCKED INCOME

There is a special excess-profits tax problem in the case of income earned abroad prior to the time of the excess-profits tax which is not taxable until a later year because of foreign monetary exchange or other restrictions. To the extent that this income is not attributable to a period in which we are taxing excess profits, it would be unjust to subject it to the high excess-profits rate. For that reason your committee has included the provision of the House bill which provides that blocked foreign income shall not be included in excess profits net income if it was earned in a year prior to the imposition of the excess-profits tax. Your committee has amended this provision to provide that the Secretary shall determine to which year the blocked income is attributable in doubtful cases.

AIR-MAIL COMPENSATION

Your committee has restored the provision of the old law which exempts airlines which have no adjusted excess-profits tax net income after excluding air-mail subsidies from their excess-profits net income. This provision was stricken from the House bill by a floor amendment. The 7-percent rate of return allowed the airlines under the bill is substantially below the rate of return allowed overseas airlines by the Civil Aeronautics Board, and since the air-mail subsidies are, to a large extent, used for the overseas lines, the effect of their exclusion is to provide equitable treatment for the overseas airlines in line with the treatment accorded them by the Civil Aeronautics Board.

MERCHANT MARINE ACT

Your committee's bill, like the House bill and the World War II excess-profits tax, permits exclusion of amounts received by shipbuilders which are required to be paid in to the Maritime Board as a revolving ship construction fund. Your committee's bill also deals with the reserve and construction funds provided by the Merchant Marine Act in which ship operators are required or permitted to deposit earnings and gains from the disposition of ships. Your committee's bill provides that these earnings during the base period, other than capital gains, shall be included in computing base-period earnings, to the extent that they exceed current payments into these funds. Also they increase the taxpayer's invested capital unless offset by current payments into these funds.

TREATMENT OF EARNINGS CREDIT IN CASE OF REORGANIZATIONS

The bill provides a part II of the excess-profits tax subchapter which is designed to carry out the functions of supplement A under the World War II excess-profits tax. The general purpose of supplement A under the old law was to provide that, in the case of tax-free consolidations or mergers of two corporations into one, the corporation continuing business after the merger may compute its earnings credit on the basis of the combined earnings experience of the two earlier corporations during the base period. Part II of subchapter D in this bill serves this same function, and it goes beyond the old law in providing similar rules in the case of a tax-free split-up as, for example, where the assets of an old corporation are split up among two or more new corporations. The rules in this latter type of case provide for an allocation of the earnings experience of the old corporation during the base period among the new corporations for purposes of determining their earnings credits under the excess-profits tax. Where the business of a partnership is incorporated, part II permits the corporation to use the base period earnings experience of the partnership, as was the case under the old law. The bill goes beyond the old law by permitting a corporation to use an allocated share of the earnings experience of a partnership where only a part of the partnership properties are incorporated.

Your committee's amendment of part II in the House bill was necessary in order to conform the treatment of part II transactions with the changes the committee amendments make in the treatment of taxpayers generally who use the earnings credit. For example, part II provides rules for the treatment of taxpayers covered by all of the special relief provisions under the earnings credit in cases involving tax-free reorganizations, consolidations, mergers, and split-ups.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CARLSON. I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the committee a question with regard to the relief of corporations which do not qualify under the invested-capital base or the average-earnings base. If I remember correctly, Congress wrote into the World War II Act section 722, which provided relief for corporations operating under abnormal conditions. I wonder if any provision is made in the bill for that type of corporation?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, I may say to the Senator from Kansas that we have tried to spell out what we clearly contemplated, or had in contemplation under section 722 of the World War Act. Section 722 of the World War Act got into the act by virtue of an amendment which the present chairman of the Finance Committee himself offered on the floor, which simply provided that in cases where abnormalities clearly existed, recourse should be had to the tax court.

Of course, that was a very crude way of presenting the issue to the Congress. In a later bill, section 722 was worked out.

The present bill approaches the same problem, but undertakes to spell out relief for new corporations formed after the base period began, for depressed industries, for corporations having abnormalities, and for other corporations which we thought were entitled to relief.

Whether the committee has gone far enough and whether those relief provisions will be altogether effective, of course, remains to be demonstrated or disproved in the administration of the act. However, we have attempted to provide for substantially all the situations for which we were seeking to give a remedy under section 722. In this bill we have a provision for the growing corporations, a formula for the so-called growth companies, which is not yet as complete as we would like to make it, and we shall offer a further amendment on that point before the bill leaves the Senate.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further in connection with this matter?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CARLSON. As the distinguished chairman of the committee well knows, section 722 was written in order to carry out the congressional intent—at least, I think it was the intent of both the House committee and the Senate committee—that some relief be given to corporations which came under that particular distress qualification. I am hoping that the Senate and the committee will stress the fact that in acting today on this bill it is the intention that some of these corporations which are growth corporations and have abnormal situations will obtain some relief under that section.

Mr. GEORGE. The committee has endeavored to do precisely that. It was as a result of the action of the joint committee that the organization known as the Excess Profits Tax Council was set up. That was done in order to bring about a better administration of section 722.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. THYE. The television industry would naturally come under the so-called growing-corporations classification because the firms engaged in the television industry are in their infancy and are growing rapidly during these years.

Mr. GEORGE. That is quite true. We have had considerable evidence from the television companies and other concerns which now are developing a new product. Of course, those who are engaged in the television industry are developing a relatively new product, and those firms also are growing rapidly.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. THYE. In northern Minnesota, for instance, we have a concern engaged in obtaining vitamins from fish livers by means of processing the oil. That is a well-established and well-recognized business. However, over a period of years that company was processing only a limited amount. Since the end of the war that firm's research and study and plans to expand its plant were such that most of its profits were plowed back into the business, into research, and into the development of a larger business. That concern will show no profits to speak of for the past 2 or 3 years, but from now on its profits might be considerable, much in excess of any profits shown in the prior several years.

How will the proposed law affect that particular corporation?

Mr. GEORGE. Was the corporation in existence before the beginning of the base period, namely, before 1946?

Mr. THYE. Yes; the corporation has been in existence for more than 10 years, and it made its expansion and its plans for expansion and research in the postwar years.

Mr. GEORGE. The bill undertakes to meet that problem, I may say to the distinguished Senator, by including a formula which may be described as an increased-capacity formula. Whether these formulas will adequately meet these situations, of course the committee cannot say. We only express the hope that they will, and we have taken the extraordinary step of providing for the rewriting of this bill by the end of December 1952, in order that we may meet the problems which, through experience, are then presented to us in a clearer light in the very brief hearing the committee was able to hold on this bill.

Mr. THYE. Mr. President, I thank the very able and distinguished chairman of the committee for answering those questions.

Mr. GEORGE. I thank the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. President, at this time I should like to do the extraordinary thing of asking unanimous consent that all the committee amendments be agreed to en bloc and that the bill as thus amended be considered as the original bill, with the right of any Senator to offer any amendment to any section or any provision, or to move to strike out or to change in any wise the text of the bill, all such motions to be considered as motions in the second degree, so that they would be in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has heard the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Georgia. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senate for giving that consent. Of course, the same result could easily be accomplished, always, by making only one amendment—in other words, by striking out all after the enacting clause and making one inclusive amendment. However, we have preferred to deal with the House text of the bill.

The committee amendments agreed to en bloc are as follows:

Under the heading "Title I—Excess Profits Tax, Subchapter D—Excess Profits Tax, Part I—Rate and Computation of Tax," on page 2, line 7, after the figures "1950", to insert "and beginning before January 1, 1953"; in line 8, after the word "in", to strike out "Section" and insert "section"; in line 10, after the word "section", to strike out "452" and insert "454"; after line 13, to strike out:

"(2) an amount which when added to the tax imposed for the taxable year under this chapter, determined without regard to the tax imposed by section 102 and without regard to the tax imposed by this subchapter, equals 67 percent of the corporation surtax net income, computed under section 15 or supplement G, as the case may be, but without regard to the credits provided in section 26 (h) and (i)."

And in lieu thereof, to insert:

"(2) an amount equal to the excess of 60 percent of the excess-profits net income for the taxable year over the tax which would be imposed for the taxable year under sections 13, 14, and 15, supplement G, and supplement Q, whichever are applicable to the taxpayer, computed (subject to sec. 108 and sec. 141, if applicable) as if the amount of the normal-tax net income and the amount of the corporation surtax net income (or the amount subject to the rate of tax in such supplement) were equal to the amount of the excess-profits net income for such year."

On page 3, after line 7, to strike out:

"For computation of tax in the case of a short taxable year, see section 433 (a) (2)."

On page 3, after line 17, to insert:

"(c) Taxable years beginning before January 1, 1953, and ending after December 31, 1952: In the case of a taxable year beginning before January 1, 1953, and ending after December 31, 1952, the tax imposed by subsection (a) shall be an amount equal to that portion of a tentative tax, determined under subsection (a), which the number of days in such taxable year before January 1, 1953, bears to the total number of days in such taxable year."

On page 4, line 1, to reletter the subsection from "(c)" to "(d)."

On page 4, after line 9, to strike out:

"(d) Deferment of payment in case of abnormality: If the adjusted excess profits net income (computed without reference to sec. 442, 443, or 444) for the taxable year of a taxpayer which claims on its return, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary, the benefits of section 442, 443, or 444, is in excess of 50 percent of its normal tax net income for such year, the amount of tax payable at the time prescribed for payment may be reduced as follows:

"(1) If the application of section 442, 443, or 444 is made in accordance with tentative rates of return described in section 445 (d), by an amount equal to 80 percent of the amount of the reduction in the tax so claimed.

"(2) If the application of section 442, 443, or 444 is made in accordance with the base period yearly rate of return described in section 445 (b) or the base period rate of return described in section 445 (c), by an amount equal to 100 percent of the amount of the reduction in the tax so claimed.

The amount of the reduction in tax, to the extent it exceeds the claimed reduction in tax finally determinec', shall be payable within 1 year after such final determination. The running of the statute of limitations provided in section 275 or 276 on the beginning of distraint or a proceeding in court for collection, in respect of such reduction in tax, shall be suspended for the period beginning with the date such tax would be payable but for this subsection and ending with the date falling 60 days after such final determination."

On page 5, after line 14, to insert:

"(e) Cross references: For special rules for computation of the tax imposed by subsection (a) in the case of—

"(1) short taxable years, see section 433 (a) (2);

"(2) corporations engaged in mining of strategic minerals, see section 450 (a);

"(3) abnormalities in income in taxable period, see section 456;

"(4) corporations completing contracts under Merchant Marine Act, see section 457."

On page 6, line 5, after the word "section", to strike out "433" and insert "433 (a)."

On page 6, line 7, after the word "excess," to strike out "profit credits" and insert "profits credit."

In section 432, on page 7, line 1, after the numerals "1950" to insert "and beginning before January 1, 1953"; in line 4, after the word "year", to insert "and computed without the allowance of any deduction under section 23 (s) (relating to net operating losses)", and in line 18, after the word "year.", to insert "The unused excess profits credit for a taxable year beginning before January 1, 1953, and ending after December 31, 1952, shall be an amount which is such part of the unused excess profits credit determined under the preceding provisions of this subsection as the number of days in such taxable year before January 1, 1953, is of the total number of days in such taxable year. There shall be no unused excess profits credit for any taxable year for which the taxpayer is exempt from taxation under this subchapter."

On page 9, line 19, after the word "sentence", to insert "or such part of the unused excess profits carry-back for such preceding taxable year, whichever is the lesser".

On page 10, after line 3, to insert:

"(e) Unused excess profits credit of year of liquidation: For any taxable year during which the taxpayer (1) completes the distribution of substantially all of its assets in liquidation, or (2) completes the conversion of substantially all of its assets into assets not held in good faith for the purposes of the business, then the unused excess profits credit for such year shall be an amount which is such part of the unused excess profits credit determined under the preceding provisions of this section as the number of days prior to the date of the completion (described in (1) or (2), whichever is earlier) is of the total number of days in the taxable year, and no part of the unused excess profits credit for such year shall be an unused excess profits credit carry-over for any succeeding taxable year."

In section 433, on page 11, after line 11, to strike out:

"(C) Gains and losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets, etc.: There shall be excluded gains and losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets and gains and losses, from sales or exchanges of property, to which section 117 (j) is applicable."

And in lieu thereof, to insert:

"(C) Gains and losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets: There shall be excluded gains and losses from sales or exchanges of capital assets."

On page 13, line 6, after the word "debt", to strike out "unless a deduction with reference to such debt was allowable from gross income for any taxable year for which an excess profits tax was imposed under this subchapter or subchapter E of chapter 2" and insert "if the deduction of such debt was allowable from gross income for any taxable year beginning before January 1, 1940, or beginning after December 31, 1945, and ending before July 1, 1950, or if such debt was properly charged to a reserve for bad debts during any such taxable year."

On page 13, line 23, after "202 (c)", to insert: "If the excess profits credit for the taxable year is computed under section 436, there shall be deducted from the normal tax net income only 50 percent of the amount determined under the preceding sentence."

On page 14, line 8, after the word "section" to strike out "451" and insert "453"; in line 11, after the word "section", to strike out "451" and insert "453"; in line 12, after the word "section", to strike out "451" and insert "453"; in line 14, after the word "section", to strike out "451" and insert "453"; in line 18, after the word "section", to strike out "451" and insert "453"; in line 19, after the word "section", to strike out "451" and insert "453"; in line 20, after the word "section", to strike out "451" and insert "453", and in line 22, after the word "this" to strike out "subparagraph," and insert "subparagraph;".

On page 14, after line 22, to strike out:

"(J) Net operating loss deduction adjustment: The net operating loss deduction shall be adjusted as follows: In lieu of the reduction provided in section 122 (c), such reduction shall be in the amount by which the excess profits net income computed with the exceptions and limitations specified in section 122 (d) (1), (2), (3), and (4) and computed without regard to subparagraph (b), without regard to any credit for dividends received, and without regard to any credit for interest received provided in section 26 (a) exceeds the excess profits net income (computed without the net operating loss deduction)."

And in lieu thereof to insert:

"(J) Net operating loss deduction adjustment: The net operating loss deduction shall be adjusted as follows:

"(i) In computing the net operating loss for any taxable year under section 122 (a), and the net income for any taxable year under section 122 (b), the deduction for interest shall be reduced by the amount of any reduction under subparagraph (N) or (O), whichever is applicable upon the basis of the excess profits credit for such taxable year; and

"(ii) In lieu of the reduction provided in section 122 (c), such reduction shall be in the amount by which the excess profits net income computed with the exceptions and limitations specified in section 122 (d) (1), (2), (3), and (4), and computed without regard to subparagraph (C), without regard to any credit for dividends received, and without regard to any credit for interest received provided in section 26 (a) exceeds the excess profits net income (computed without the net operating loss deduction); and

"(iii) If the excess profits credit for the first taxable year under this subchapter is computed under section 435, the taxpayer may elect in its return for such taxable year to compute its net operating loss deduction for the purposes of this subsection for all taxable years by treating an amount equal to the base period loss adjustment (as defined in clause (iv)) as a net operating loss carryover from the last taxable year ending before July 1, 1950, but for such purposes the net income computed under section 122 (b) for any taxable year ending before July 1, 1950, shall be determined without regard to such carry-over;

"(iv) For the purposes of clause (iii), the base period loss adjustment shall be the amount of the recent loss adjustment determined under section 437 (f), using the base period as the recent loss period, and computed by limiting the amount of the net operating loss for any taxable year beginning before January 1, 1948, to an amount equal to the net operating loss carry-over from such taxable year to the taxable year immediately succeeding such taxable year; and

"(v) If the taxpayer makes the election provided in clause (iii) of this subparagraph, the net operating loss deduction for the purposes of this subsection for each taxable year ending after June 30, 1950 (whether or not the credit for such taxable year is computed under section 435), shall be computed without regard to the net operating loss for any taxable year ending before July 1, 1950, and the net operating loss carry-over specified in clause (iii) of this subparagraph shall not be allowed as a net operating loss carry-over to any taxable year for which the excess profits credit is not computed under section 435."

On page 18, line 10, after "lessee.", to insert: "For the purposes of this subparapgraph an agreement for lease of railroad properties entered into prior to December 1, 1950, shall be considered to be a lease including such term as the total number of years such agreement may, unless sooner terminated, be renewed or continued under the terms of the agreement, and any such renewal or continuance under such agreement shall be considered part of the lease entered into prior to December 1, 1950."

On page 19, line 2, after the figure "23", to strike out "(k)," and insert "(k);".

On page 19, line 10, after the word "subchapter.", to strike out "the determination of the extent to which income so derived shall be considered to have been includible, but for such restrictions, in the gross income of the taxpayer for years which preceded its first taxable year under this subchapter shall be made under regulations prescribed by the Secretary," and insert "In determining the taxable year for which income derived from foreign sources would have been includible (but for such restrictions) in cases where specific identification cannot be made, such determinations shall be made in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary."

On page 20, line 15, after the word "be", to strike out "allowed." and insert "allowed;".

On page 20, after line 15, to insert:

"(N) Interest—Credit based upon invested capital: If the excess profits credit for the taxable year is computed under section 436 the deduction for interest shall be reduced by so much of such interest as represents interest on the indebtedness included in the daily amounts of borrowed capital (determined under section 439 (b)).

"(O) Interest—Credit based upon income: If the excess-profits credit for the taxable year is computed under section 435, the deduction for interest shall be reduced by an amount which bears the same ratio to the interest on the indebtedness included in the daily amounts of borrowed capital (determined under section 439 (b)) as the excess of the amount determined under section 435 (g) (3) (C) over the aggregate, divided by the number of days in the taxable year, of the amount determined under section 435 (g) (4) (E) for each day of the taxable year, bears to the average borrowed capital for the taxable years (as defined in section 439 (a)).

"(P) Payments to encourage exploration, development, and mining for defense purposes: An amount paid to a taxpayer by the United States (or any agency or instrumentality thereof), whether by grant or loan, and whether or not repayable, for the encouragement of exploration, development, or mining of critical and strategic minerals or metals pursuant to or in connection with any undertaking approved by the United States (or any of its agencies or instrumentalities) and for which an accounting is made or required to be made to an appropriate governmental agency, and the forgiveness or discharge of any of such amount, shall be excluded in computing excess-profits net income; and any expenditures (other than expenditures made after the repayment of such grant or loan) attributable to such grant or loan shall not be deductible by the taxpayer as an expense nor increase the basis of the taxpayer's property either for determining gain or loss on sale, exchange, or other disposition or for computing depletion or depreciation, but upon the repayment of any portion of any such grant or loan which has been expended in accordance with the terms thereof such deductions and such increase in basis shall to the extent of such repayment be allowed as if made at the time of such repayment;

"(Q) Income from installment sales, long-term contracts, etc.: For adjustment, in the case of a taxpayer making an election provided in section 455, with respect to income derived from installment sales, installment sales obligations, or long-term contracts, see section 455."

On page 25, line 3, after the word "year", to strike out "within, or beginning or ending within, the base period."

On page 27, line 15, after "Sales.—", strike out "Income" and insert "In the case of a taxpayer which has made the election provided in section 455 (a), income"; in line 17, after the word "sales", to insert "and from installment sales obligations"; in line 20, after the word "method", to insert "without treating any portion of such income as unrealized at the close of any period"; in line 22, after the word "on", to strike out "the" and insert "such", and in line 23, after the word "periods.", to strike out "This paragraph shall be applicable only for the purpose of computing the average base period earnings in determining the excess-profits credit for any taxable year for which an election made under section 453 (a) is applicable, and shall have no application in the computation under section 435 (f) of the base period capital addition."

On page 28, line 5, after "Contracts.—", to strike out "Income" and insert "In the case of a taxpayer which has made the election provided in section 455 (b), income", and in line 11, after the words "periods.", to strike out "This paragraph shall be applicable only for the purpose of computing the average base period earnings in determining the excess-profits credit for any taxable year for which an election under section 453 (b) is applicable and shall have no application in the computation under section 435 (f) of the base period capital addition."

On page 28, line 20, after the word "Deductions.", to strike out:

"Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary for the determination, for purposes of this paragraph, of the classification of deductions for any taxable year or years within, or beginning or ending within, the base period, if—

"(A) any class of similar deductions for the taxable year attributable to a claim, award, judgment, or decree against the taxpayer, or interest on any of the foregoing."

On page 29, after line 3, to strike out:

"(B) any class of similar deductions for the taxable year attributable to intangible drilling and development costs paid or incurred in or for the drilling of wells or the preparation of wells for the production of oil or gas, and for development costs in the case of mines."

On page 29, after line 9, to strike out:

"(C) any class of similar deductions for the taxable year under section 23 (f) for losses arising from fires, storms, shipwreck, or other casualty, or from theft, or arising from the demolition, abandonment, or loss of useful value of property, not compensated for by insurance or otherwise; or."

On page 29, after line 15, to strike out:

"(D) any other class of deductions for the taxable year, exceeded 115 percent of the average amount of deductions of such class for the four previous taxable years, the deductions of such class shall, subject to the rules provided in paragraph (10), be disallowed in an amount equal to such excess."

And in line 22, after the amendment just above stated, to insert:

"If, for any taxable year or years within, or beginning or ending within, the base period, any class of deductions for the taxable year exceeded 115 percent of the average amount of deductions of such class for the four previous taxable years, the deductions of such class shall, subject to the rules provided in paragraph (10), be disallowed in an amount equal to such excess. For the purposes of this paragraph, each of the following groups of deductions shall constitute a class of deductions:

"(A) Deductions attributable to claims, awards, judgments, and decrees against the taxpayer, and interest on the foregoing;

"(B) Deductions attributable to intangible drilling and development costs paid or incurred in or for the drilling of wells or the preparation of wells for the production of oil or gas, and for development costs in the case of mines; and

"(C) Deductions under section 23 (f) for losses arising from fires, storms, shipwreck, or other casualty, or from theft, or arising from the demolition, abandonment, or loss of useful value of property, not compensated for by insurance or otherwise. The class of deductions under this subparagraph for any taxable year shall not include deductions which are excludible under paragraph (2) or which would be so excludible if such paragraph were applicable with respect to such taxable year.

The classification of deductions of any class not described in subparagraphs (A) to (C), inclusive, shall be subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary."

At the top of page 32, to strike out: "For the purpose of the preceding sentence a deficit in excess profits net income for any taxable year shall be counted as zero."

On page 32, after line 3, to strike out: "(C) Deductions shall not be disallowed under such paragraphs unless the taxpayer establishes that the excess is not a cause or a consequence of an increase in the gross income of the taxpayer in its base period or a decrease in the amount of some other deduction in its base period, and is not a cause or a consequence of a change at any time in the type, manner of operation, size, or condition of the business engaged in by the taxpayer."

On page 32, after line 12, to insert: "Such average excess profits net income shall, for the purposes of this subparagraph, be computed by aggregating the excess profits net incomes of all such taxable years, dividing such aggregate by the total number of months in such years, and multiplying the quotient by 12. For the purposes of this subparagraph, the excess profits net income for any taxable year shall in no case be less than zero."

On page 32, after line 20, to insert: "(C) Deductions of any class shall not be disallowed under such paragraph unless the taxpayer establishes that the increase in such deductions—

"(i) is not a cause or a consequence of an increase in the gross income of the taxpayer in its base period or a decrease in the amount of some other deduction in its base period, which increase or decrease is substantial in relation to the amount of the increase in the deductions of such class, and

"(ii) is not a consequence of a change at any time in the type, manner of operation, size, or condition of the business engaged in by the taxpayer."

On page 33, after line 16, to strike out:

"(E) If the taxpayer's average base period net income is determined under section 435 (e), there shall not be disallowed under such paragraph any amount which is to be taken into account under section 435 (e) (4) for the purpose of determining the total payroll of the taxpayer."

On page 34, line 10, after the word "lessee.", to insert: "For the purposes of this paragraph an agreement for lease of railroad properties entered into prior to December 1, 1950, shall be considered to be a lease including such term as the total number of years such agreement may, unless sooner terminated, be renewed or continued under the terms of the agreement, and any such renewal or continuance under such agreement shall be considered part of the lease entered into prior to December 1, 1950."

At the top of page 35, to insert:

"(13) Bank assesments by Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. In the case of a bank (as defined in section 104), the deduction for the assessment by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation shall be reduced to an amount which is such part thereof as the net assesment (after credits applicable thereto) for the taxable year for which the excess profits credit is being computed is of the gross assesment for such taxable year."

On page 35, after line 8, to insert:

"(14) Life insurance companies: In the case of a life insurance company, there shall be deducted from the normal-tax net income the excess of (A) the product of (i) the figure determined and proclaimed under section 202 (b) and (ii) the excess profits net income computed without regard to this paragraph, over (B) the adjustment for certain reserves provided in section 202 (c)."

On page 35, after line 16, to insert:

"(15) Credit for income subject to prior excess-profits tax. The credit provided in section 26 (e) shall not be allowed.

"(c) Deficit in excess profits net income: For the purposes of this subchapter, the deficit in excess profits net income for any taxable year shall be the excess, if any, of—

"(1) the sum of the deductions from gross income, the credit for dividends received, the credit provided in section 26 (a) (relating to interest on certain obligations of the United States and its instrumentalities) and the amount of the decrease resulting from the adjustments provided in subsection (b), over

"(2) the sum of the gross income and the amount of the increase resulting from the adjustments provided in subsection (b)."

On page 36, line 14, after the word "computed", to strike out "For allowance of excess-profits credit in case of certain reorganizations, see part II of this subchapter."

On page 37, line 5, after the word "section", to strike out "436" and insert "436 (b)".

On page 37, line 9, after the word "section", to strike out "446" and insert "448"; in line 11, after the word "section", to strike out "446" and insert "448", and in line 13, after the word "computed", to insert "In the case of a regulated public utility which has made and filed a consent described in section 141 (e) (8) or (j) applicable to the taxable year, the excess-profits credit shall, for purposes of filing a consolidated return, be determined in accordance with such consent."

On page 37, line 21, after "section (a)", to insert "or (c)"; in line 25, after the word "agreement", to insert "or agreements"; in the same line, after the word "to", to strike out "July" and insert "December"; on page 38, line 1, after the word "where", to strike out "the" and insert "each"; in line 2, after the word "and", to strike out "requires" and insert "where under one or more of the leases or agreements relating to the leased properties"; in line 3, after the word "lessee", to insert "is, or the lessees are, required"; in line 8, after the word "among", to strike out "each of such corporations" and insert "the lessor and each of the lessee corporations so required to pay the taxes of the lessor under this subchapter", and in line 12, after the word "Secretary", to insert: "For the purposes of this subsection an agreement for lease of railroad properties entered into prior to December 1, 1950, shall be considered to be a lease including such term as the total number of years such agreement may, unless sooner terminated, be renewed or continued under the terms of the agreement, and any such renewal or continuance under such agreement shall be considered part of the lease entered into prior to December 1, 1950."

And insert:

"(B) the total assets of the taxpayer as of the first day of its base period (when added to the total assets for such day of all corporations with which the taxpayer has the privilege under section 141 of filing a consolidated return for its first taxable year under this subchapter), determined under paragraph (3), did not exceed $20,000,000; and."

On page 44, after line 7, to strike out "The average base period net income determined under this subsection shall be the amount ascertained under subparagraph (C) or subparagraph (D), whichever is the larger."

On page 44, after line 11, to insert:

"(E) By computing (in the manner provided by the second sentence of subsection (d) (1)) the excess profits net income for each of the 12 months in the period beginning July 1, 1949, and ending June 30, 1950. For the purposes of this subparagraph the excess profits net income for any month after December 1949 shall be the 'weighted excess profits net income' for the taxable year in which such month falls divided by the number of full calendar months in such year, but in no case shall such excess profits net income for any month be less than zero. The 'weighted excess profits net income' for any taxable year beginning before July 1, 1950, shall be—

"(i) 100 percent of the excess profits net income for the taxable year if such year ends before July 1, 1950;

"(ii) 90 percent of the excess profits net income for the taxable year if such year ends after June 30, 1950, and before October 1, 1950;

"(iii) 80 percent of the excess profits net income for the taxable year if such year ends after September 30, 1950, and before April 1, 1050; and

"(iv) 70 percent of the excess profits net income for the taxable year if such year ends after March 31, 1951.

"(F) By computing the aggregate of the excess profits net income for each of the 12 months referred to in subparagraph (E). The average base period net income determined under this subsection shall be the amount ascertained under subparagraph (C), (D), or (F), whichever is the highest."

On page 46, line 1, after the word "cash", to strike out "used in the taxpayer's business" and insert ", held by such taxpayer for the purposes of the business."; and after line 4, to insert "In case the taxpayer has the privilege under section 141 of filing a consolidated return for its first taxable year under this subchapter, the total assets of the affiliated group as of any day shall be determined under regulations prescribed by the Secretary."

On page 46, line 20, after the words "of the", to strike out "period" and insert "year"; and in line 21, after the word "such", to strike out "year" and insert "period."

On page 48, line 3, after the words "portion of the", to strike out "period" and insert "year"; and in the same line, after the word "such", to strike out "year" and insert "period."

On page 48, after line 8, to strike out:

"(1) Base period capital addition: The amount of the base period capital addition referred to in subsection (a) (1) (B) shall be the sum of—

"(A) 12 percent of the net base period equity capital addition, computed under paragraph (2) (C),

"(B) the amount of the base period borrowed capital addition, computed under paragraph (3) (D), minus the sum of 12 percent of the net base period equity capital reduction, computed under paragraph (2) (D), and the amount of the base period borrowed capital reduction, computed under paragraph (3) (E); except that the base period capital addition shall in no case be less than zero.

"(2) Net base period capital addition or reduction.—

"(A) The net increase in equity capital during any period shall, for the purposes of this subsection, be the amount, if any, by which the equity capital (as defined in section 437 (c)) at the end of such period exceeds the equity capital at the beginning of such period. The amount ascertained under this subparagraph shall be reduced by the excess, if any, of the inadmissible assets (as defined in section 440) of the taxpayer at the end of such period over the inadmissible assets at the beginning of such period. The net increase in equity capital shall in no case be less than zero.

"(B) The net decrease in equity capital during any period shall, for the purposes of this subsection, be the amount, if any, by which the equity capital (as defined in section 437 (c)) at the beginning of such period exceeds the equity capital at the end of such period. The amount ascertained under this subparagraph shall be reduced by the excess, if any, of the inadmissible assets (as defined in section 440) of the taxpayer at the beginning of such period over the inadmissible assets at the end of such period. The net decrease in equity capital shall in no case be less than zero.

"(C) The net base period equity capital addition shall be the excess of—

"(i) the net increase, if any, in equity capital during the period covered by the last two taxable years of the taxpayer which precede its first taxable year under this subchapter, over

"(ii) one-half of the amount by which the net increase, if any, in equity capital during the earlier taxable year in such period exceeds the net decrease, if any, in equity capital during the later taxable year in such period.

"(D) The net base period equity capital reduction shall be the excess of—

"(i) the net decrease, if any, in equity capital during the period covered by the last two taxable years of the taxpayer which precede its first taxable year under this subchapter, over

"(ii) one-half of the amount by which the net decrease, if any, in equity capital during the earlier taxable year in such period exceeds the net increase, if any, in equity capital during the later taxable year in such period.

"(3) Base period borrowed capital addition or reduction.—

"(A) The adjustment for the net increase in borrowed capital during any period shall, for the purposes of this subsection, be an amount equal to (i) one-third of the amount by which the daily borrowed capital (as determined under section 439 (c)) for the day following the close of such period exceeds the daily borrowed capital for the first day of such period, times (ii) the average interest rate for the day following the close of such period. The adjustment for the net increase in borrowed capital shall in no case be less than zero.

"(B) The adjustment for the net decrease in borrowed capital during any period shall, for the purposes of this subsection, be an amount equal to (i) one-third of the amount by which the daily borrowed capital (as determined under section 439 (c)) for the first day of such period exceeds the daily borrowed capital for the day following the close of such period, times (ii) the average interest rate for the first day of such period. The adjustment for the net decrease in borrowed capital shall in no case be less than zero.

"(C) The average interest rate for any day shall, for the purposes of subparagraphs (A) and (B), be an amount equal to the amount ascertained by dividing the aggregate of 1 year's interest on the daily borrowed capital for such day by the amount of the daily borrowed capital for such day.

"(D) The amount of the base period borrowed capital addition shall, for the purposes of paragraph (1) (B), be the excess of—

"(i) the adjustment, if any, for the net increase in borrowed capital during the period covered by the last two taxable years of the taxpayer which precede its first taxable year under this subchapter, over

"(ii) one-half of the amount by which the adjustment, if any, for the net increase in borrowed capital during the earlier taxable year in such period exceeds the adjustment, if any, for the net decrease in borrowed capital during the later taxable year in such period.

"(E) The amount of the base period borrowed capital reduction shall, for the purposes of paragraph (1), be the excess of—

"(i) the adjustment, if any, for the net decrease in borrowed capital during the period covered by the last 2 taxable years of the taxpayer which precede its first taxable year under this subchapter, over

"(ii) one-half of the amount by which the adjustment, if any, for the net decrease in borrowed capital during the earlier taxable year in such period exceeds the adjustment, if any, for the net increase in borrowed capital during the later taxable year in such period."

On page 53, after line 11, to insert:

"(1) Definition of yearly base period capital: For the purposes of this subsection, the yearly base period capital for any taxable year shall be the sum of the equity capital (as defined in sec. 437 (c)) at the beginning of such taxable year and the daily borrowed capital (as defined in sec. 439 (b)) for the first day of such taxable year, reduced by the sum of—

"(A) the amount of inadmissible assets at the beginning of such taxable year, determined under section 440,

"(B) the amount of loans to members of a controlled group, determined under paragraph (4), and

"(C) the amount of the adjustment for interest on borrowed capital, determined under paragraph (5).

"(2) Computation of base period capital addition—general rule: The amount of the base period capital addition referred to in subsection (a) (1) (B) shall, except in cases otherwise provided for in paragraph (3), be determined as follows:

"(A) By computing the yearly base period capital for each of the following years:

"(i) the first taxable year of the taxpayer under this subchapter;

"(ii) the immediately preceding taxable year; and

"(iii) the second preceding taxable year.

"(B) By computing the amount of the excess, if any, of the amount ascertained under subparagraph (A) (i) over the higher of the amounts ascertained under subparagraphs (A) (ii) and (A) (iii).

"(C) By computing the amount of the excess, if any, of the lower of the amounts ascertained under subparagraphs (A) (i) and (A) (ii) over the amount ascertained under subparagraph (A) (iii).

"(D) By adding to the amount ascertained under subparagraph (B) one-half of the amount ascertained under subparagraph (C).

"(3) Special rules in case of abnormality during base period: In the event that the average base period net income of the taxpayer is determined under section 442, then—

"(A) If its average base period net income is determined under section 442 (d), the base period capital addition shall be zero.

"(B) If its average base period net income is determined under section 442 (c) (1) by including a substitute excess profits net income for any part of its first taxable year under this subchapter or for the immediately preceding year, the base period capital addition shall be zero.

"(C) If its average base period net income is computed under section 442 (c) (1) by including a substitute excess-profits net income for any part of the earlier of the taxpayer's two taxable years immediately preceding its first taxable year under this subchapter, the base period capital addition shall be the excess, if any, of the amount ascertained under paragraph (2) (A) (i) over the amount ascertained under paragraph (2) (A) (ii).

"(4) Loan to members of a controlled group: If, on the first day of any taxable year, the taxpayer and any one or more other corporations are members of the same controlled group, as defined in subsection (g) (6), the amount referred to in paragraph (1) (B) with respect to such taxable year shall be the amount of the indebtedness of such other corporation (or if more than one, such other corporations) to the taxpayer at the beginning of such day. For the purposes of this paragraph, the term 'indebtedness' means indebtedness which constitutes daily borrowed capital, as defined in section 439 (b) (1), of such other corporation for such day.

"(5) Adjustment for interest on borrowed capital: The adjustment for interest on borrowed capital referred to in paragraph (1) (C) with respect to any taxable year shall be determined as follows:

"(A) By multiplying any indebtedness of the taxpayer which constitutes daily borrowed capital (as defined in sec. 439 (b)) for the first day of such taxable year by the annual rate of interest payable upon such indebtedness during such taxable year.

"(B) By aggregating the amounts ascertained under subparagraph (A) with respect to all borrowed capital for such day.

"(C) by multiplying the aggregate amount ascertained under subparagraph (B) by 100, and dividing the product by 12.

"(6) Cross reference: For special rules applicable to this subsection see section 441."

On page 57, line 8, after "(g)", to strike out "Capital changes." and insert "Net capital addition or reduction."

On page 57, line 16, after the word "year.", to insert "If there is an increase in inadmissible assets for the taxable year, determined under paragraph (5), the net capital addition shall be the excess of the amount determined under the preceding sentence over the amount of such increase in inadmissible assets."

On page 58, line 4, after the word "year.", to insert "If there is a decrease in inadmissible assets for the taxable year, determined under paragraph (5), the net capital reduction shall be the excess of the amount determined under the preceding sentence over the amount of such decrease in inadmissible assets."

On page 58, line 15, after the word "day.", to strike out "Such property paid in shall be included in an amount equal to its basis (unadjusted) for determining gain upon sale or exchange. If the unadjusted basis of the property is a substituted basis, such basis shall be adjusted, with respect to the period before the property was paid in by an amount equal to the adjustments proper under section 113 (b) (2)."

On page 59, after line 3, to insert:

"(C) The amount, if any, by which the average borrowed capital for the taxable year (as defined in section 439 (a)) exceeds the daily borrowed capital for the first day of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter."

On page 59, after line 8, to strike out: "The amount ascertained under this paragraph shall be reduced by the excess, if any, of the inadmissible assets (as defined in section 440) of the taxpayer at the beginning of such day over the inadmissible assets at the beginning of its first taxable year under this subchapter. The daily capital addition shall in no case be less than zero."

On page 60, line 2, after the word "taxable", to strike out "year.", and insert: "year; and

"(C) The amount, if any, by which the daily borrowed capital (as determined under section 439 (b)) for the first day of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter exceeds the average borrowed capital for the taxable year; and

"(D) The amount determined under paragraph (6), relating to increase in certain inadmissible assets by a member of a controlled group; and

"(E) The amount determined under paragraph (7), relating to increase in loans to a member of a controlled group."

On page 60, after line 14, to strike out: "The amount ascertained under this paragraph shall be reduced by the excess, if any, of the inadmissible assets (as defined in sec. 440) of the taxpayer at the beginning of its first taxable year under this subchapter over its inadmissible assets at the beginning of such day. The daily capital reduction shall in no case be less than zero.

"(5) Cross-reference: For special rules applicable to this subsection with respect to distributions to shareholders, see section 437 (g)."

At the top of page 61, to insert:

"(5) Definitions with respect to inadmissible assets: For the purposes of this subsection—

"(A) Average inadmissible assets for the taxable year: The average inadmissible assets for any taxable year shall be the total of the daily amounts attributable to the inadmissible assets for such taxable year, determined under section 440 (b) divided by the number of days in such taxable year.

"(B) Original inadmissible assets: The term 'original inadmissible assets' means the total of the inadmissible assets for the first day of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter, determined under section 440 (b).

"(C) Increase in inadmissible assets: The term 'increase in inadmissible assets' for any taxable year means the excess of the average inadmissible assets for such taxable year over the original inadmissible assets.

"(D) Decrease in inadmissible assets: The term 'decrease in inadmissible assets' for any taxable year means the excess of the original inadmissible assets over the average inadmissible assets for such year.

"(6) Controlled group: If, on any day of the taxable year, the taxpayer and any one or more other corporations are members of the same controlled group, the amount added to the daily capital reduction under paragraph (4) (D) shall be whichever of the following amounts is the lesser:

"(A) The excess of the aggregate of the adjusted basis (for determining gain upon sale or exchange) of stock in such other corporation (or if more than one, in such other corporations) held by the taxpayer at the beginning of such day over the aggregate of the adjusted basis (for determining gain upon sale or exchange) of stock in such other corporation (or if more than one, in such other corporations) held by the taxpayer at the beginning of its first taxable year under this subchapter; or

"(B) The excess of the aggregate of the adjusted basis (for determining gain upon sale or exchange) of inadmissible assets held by the taxpayer at the beginning of such day, over the aggregate of the adjusted basis (for determining gain upon sale or exchange) of inadmissible assets held by the taxpayer at the beginning of its first taxable year under this subchapter.

The increase in inadmissible assets for the taxable year shall, for the purposes of paragraph (1), be determined by reducing the inadmissible assets for such day by the amount by which the daily capital reduction for such day is increased under this paragraph. As used in this paragraph, a controlled group means one or more chains of corporations connected through stock ownership with a common parent corporation if (i) more than 50 percent of the total combined voting power of all classes of stock entitled to vote, or more than 50 percent of the total value of shares of all classes of stock, of each of the corporations (except the common parent corporation) is owned directly by one or more of the other corporations and (ii) the common parent corporation owns directly more than 50 percent of the total combined voting power of all classes of stock entitled to vote, or more than 50 percent of the total value of shares of all classes of stock, of at least one of the other corporations.

"(7) Loans to members of a controlled group: If, on any day of the taxable year, the taxpayer and any one or more other corporations are members of the same controlled group, as defined in paragraph (6), the amount added to the daily capital reduction under paragraph (4) (E) shall be the excess of the amount of the indebtedness of such other corporation (or if more than one, such other corporations) to the taxpayer at the beginning of such day over the amount of the indebtedness by such other corporation (or if more than one, such other corporations) to the taxpayer at the beginning of its first taxable year under this subchapter. For the purposes of this paragraph, the term 'indebtedness' means indebtedness which constitutes daily borrowed capital, as defined in section 439 (b) (1), of such other corporation for such day.

"(8) Cross reference: For special rules applicable to this subsection see section 441."

On page 64, after line 10, to strike out:

"(h) Additions and reductions in borrowed capital.—

"(1) Credit for addition to borrowed capital: The amount of the credit referred to in subsection (a) (1) (D) shall, for any taxable year, be an amount equal to (A) one-third of the excess of the average borrowed capital for such year (as determined under section 439 (c)) over the daily borrowed capital for the first day of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter, multiplied by (B) the average interest rate for the taxable year; except that such credit shall in no case exceed an amount equal to 3 percent of such excess.

"(2) Borrowed capital reduction: The amount of the borrowed capital reduction referred to in subsection (a) (1) shall, for any taxable year, be an amount equal to (A) one-third of the excess of the daily borrowed capital for the first day of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter (as determined under sec. 439 (c)) over the average borrowed capital for the taxable year, multiplied by (B) the average interest rate for the last preceding taxable year during which the taxpayer had borrowed capital; except that such reduction shall in no case exceed an amount equal to 3 percent of such excess.

"(3) Definition of average interest rate: The average interest rate for any taxable year shall be the amount ascertained by dividing the total interest accrued for such year with respect to borrowed capital by the amount of the average borrowed capital for such year."

On page 65, after line 18, to strike out:

"The excess-profits credit for any taxable year computed under this section shall be the sum of the following:

"(1) The basic equity capital credit computed under section 437,

"(2) The new capital credit, if any, computed under section 438 (a),

"(3) The borrowed capital credit, if any, computed under section 439, reduced by the amount computed under section 440 (relating to inadmissible assets)."

On page 66, after line 4, to insert:

"(a) General rule: In the case of a domestic corporation (except a corporation described in subsection (b)) the excess-profits credit for any taxable year computed under this section shall be the sum of the following:

"(1) The invested capital credit computed under section 437, reduced by the amount computed under section 440 (b) (relating to inadmissible assets), and

"(2) The new capital credit, if any, computed under section 438 (a).

"(b) Foreign corporations and corporations entitled to benefits of section 251.—

"(1) Computation of credit: In the case of a foreign corporation engaged in a trade or business within the United States, and in the case of a corporation entitled to the benefits of section 251, the excess-profits credit for any taxable year computed under this section shall be determined in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary, under which—

"(A) General rule: The excess profits credit shall be the invested capital credit computed under section 437, reduced by the amount computed under section 440 (b) (relating to inadmissible assets). In computing the invested capital credit for the purposes of this subsection, (i) the invested capital for any taxable year shall (in lieu of the amount provided in section 437 (b) (1)) be the aggregate of the sum of the equity capital (determined under section 437 (c)) as of the beginning of each day of such taxable year and the daily borrowed capital (determined under section 439 (b)) for each such day divided by the number of days in such year, (ii) the term 'assets' as used in section 437 (c) shall be considered as referring to United States assets, (iii) the term 'liabilities' as used in such section shall be considered as referring to United States liabilities, and (iv) the daily borrowed capital shall be determined under section 439 (b) by reference only to United States liabilities. In the application of section 440, the terms 'admissible assets' and 'inadmissible assets' shall include only United States assets.

"(B) Exception: If the Secretary determines that the United States assets of the taxpayer cannot satisfactorily be segregated from its other assets or that the United States liabilities of the taxpayer cannot satisfactorily be segregated from its other liabilities, the invested capital of the taxpayer shall be an amount (in lieu of the amount ascertained under subparagraph (A)) which is the same percentage of the sum of the equity capital of the taxpayer, determined under section 437 (c) as of the end of the last day of the taxable year without the application of this subparagraph, and the daily borrowed capital determined under section 439 (b) for the day following such last day without the application of this subparagraph, which the net income for the taxable year from sources within the United States is of the total net income of the taxpayer for such year.

"(2) Definitions: As used in this subsection—

"(A) the term 'United States assets' means assets held by the taxpayer (in good faith for the purposes of the business) in the United States, determined in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary.

"(B) the term 'United States liabilities' means the liabilities of the taxpayer which are directly related to its United States assets, determined in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary."

On page 69, line 1, after "SEC. 437.", to strike out "Basic Equity" and insert "Invested."

On page 69, line 2, after the word "The", to strike out "basic equity" and insert "invested"; after line 4, in the first line of the table, after the word "the", to strike out "adjusted equity" and insert "invested"; in the next line, after the word "year", to strike out "(determined under subsection (b))" and insert "(as defined in subsection (b) (1))"; and in line 5 of the table, after the words "of the", to strike out "adjusted equity" and insert "invested."

On page 69, after the table, beginning with line 5, to strike out:

"(b) Adjusted equity capital: The adjusted equity capital for any taxable year (hereinafter in this subsection referred to as 'the taxable year') shall be the sum of—

"(1) the equity capital (as defined in subsection (c)) as of the beginning of the taxable year;

"(2) the capital addition for the taxable year computed under subsection (d); and

"(3) the recent loss adjustment computed under subsection (f), minus the capital reduction for the taxable year computed under subsection (e). If the amount of the adjusted equity capital so computed is over $5,000,000, such amount shall be reduced by the net new capital addition computed under section 438."

At the top of page 70, to insert:

"(b) Invested capital.—

"(1) Election of taxpayer: The invested capital for any taxable year shall be the adjusted invested capital determined under paragraph (2), except that if the taxpayer elects in its return for such taxable year to compute its invested capital under the provisions of section 458, the invested capital for such year shall be the historical invested capital determined under section 458. For the invested capital of certain insurance companies, see paragraph (3). For increase in adjusted invested capital or historical invested capital in the case of certain corporations making deposits under the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, see section 457 (c).

"(2) Adjusted invested capital: The adjusted invested capital for any taxable year (hereinafter in this paragraph referred to as 'the taxable year') shall be the sum of—

"(A) the equity capital (as defined in subsection (c)) as of the beginning of the taxable year;

"(B) the capital addition for the taxable year computed under subsection (d);

"(C) the average borrowed capital for the taxable year computed under section 439 (a); and

"(D) the recent loss adjustment computed under subsection (f), minus the capital reduction for the taxable year computed under subsection (e). If the amount of the adjusted invested capital so computed is over $5,000,000, such amount shall be reduced by the net new capital addition computed under section 438 (b).

"(3) Mutual insurance company (other than life or marine): The invested capital of a mutual insurance company (other than life or marine) shall be the mean of its surplus, plus 50 per centum of the mean of all reserves required by law, both surplus and reserves being determined at the beginning and end of the taxable year, and it may include as equity capital its organization expenses. The surplus shall include all of the assets of the company other than the reserves required by law."

On page 71, line 18, after the word "time", to insert "in good faith for the purposes of the business", and in line 24, after the word "exchange.", to strike out "In the case of an insurance company, its reserves shall be treated as liabilities and not as assets.", and insert "In the case of an insurance company (other than mutual and other than life or marine), 50 per centum of its reserves required by law (other than reserves which constitute borrowed capital under sec. 439 (b) (2)) shall be considered as equity capital and, it may include as equity capital its organization expenses. In the case of a bank (as defined in sec. 104) its reserves for bad debts shall not be treated as liabilities."

On page 72, after line 20, to strike out "Such property shall be included in an amount equal to its basis (unadjusted) for determining gain upon sale or exchange. If the unadjusted basis of the property is a substituted basis, such basis shall be adjusted, with respect to the period before the property was paid in, by an amount equal to the adjustments proper under section 113 (b) (2)."

On page 75, after line 20, to strike out:

"(g) Rules for application of this section, section 438, and section 435 (g): For the purposes of this section, section 438, and section 435 (g)—

"(1) Distributions to shareholders: A distribution by a corporation of its stock or rights to acquire its stock shall not be regarded as money or property paid in for stock, or as paid-in surplus, or as a contribution to capital, and such a distribution shall not be considered as a distribution by a corporation to its shareholders.

"(2) Distributions in first 60 days of taxable year: So much of the distributions (taken in the order of time) to shareholders made during the first 60 days of any taxable year as does not exceed the accumulated earnings and profits as of the beginning thereof (computed without regard to this paragraph) shall be considered to have been made on the last day of the preceding taxable year. This paragraph shall not apply with respect to distributions made during the first 60 days of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter.

"(3) Computation of earnings and profits of taxable year: For the purposes of subsection (c) of this section and section 435 (g) (4) (A), in determining whether a distribution is out of the earnings and profits of any taxable year, such earnings and profits shall be computed as of the close of such taxable year without diminution by reason of any distribution made during such taxable year or by reason of the tax under this chapter for such year and the determination shall be made without regard to the amount of earnings and profits at the time the distribution was made.

"(4) Exchanges: For the purpose of determining the amount of property paid in for stock, or as paid-in surplus, or as a contribution to capital—

"(A) If the basis (unadjusted) of the property for determining gain upon a sale or exchange is determined by reference to the basis of the property in the hands of the transferor, proper adjustment shall be made for the amount of any liability of the transferor assumed upon the exchange and of any liability subject to which such property was so received, for the amount of any other liability of the taxpayer constituting consideration for the property so received, and for the aggregate of the amount of money and the fair market value of other property (other than such stock and other than such liabilities) transferred to the transferor.

"(B) If the property consists of an indebtedness of the taxpayer, the amount of such property shall be considered equal to the amount of the indebtedness.

"(5) Election under section 453. In the case of a taxpayer electing under section 453, the adjusted equity invested capital, the net new capital addition, and the net capital addition shall be computed in a manner consistent with the method of accounting so elected, except as to installment sales made prior to the first taxable year under this subchapter in the case of a taxpayer electing under section 453 (a), and except as to contracts begun before the first taxable year under this subchapter in the case of a taxpayer electing under section 453 (b).

"(6) Cross references: For special rules affecting determination of basis of property acquired in certain intercorporate liquidations, see part III."

On page 78, line 12, after "Sec. 438.", to strike out "Capital Changes" and insert "New Capital Credit."

On page 78, line 16, after the word "except", to strike out "that the new capital credit shall be zero if the adjusted equity capital for the taxable year, computed without regard to the last sentence of section 437 (b), is $5,000,000 or less.", and insert "that the credit provided by this subsection shall not be allowed—

"(1) if the invested capital for the taxable year (computed without reduction by the amount of the net new capital addition) is $5,000,000 or less;

"(2) if the invested capital for the taxable year is the historical invested capital determined under section 458;

"(3) if the taxpayer is a mutual insurance company (other than life or marine)."

On page 79, line 8, after the word "addition", to strike out "for each day of the taxable year over the aggregate of the daily capital reduction (determined under section 437 (e)) for each day of the taxable year" and insert "(determined under subsection (c)) for each day of the taxable year over the aggregate of the daily new capital reduction (determined under subsection (d)) for each day of the taxable year. If there is an increase in inadmissible assets for the taxable year, determined under section 435 (g) (5), the net new capital addition shall be the excess of the amount determined under the preceding sentence over the amount of such increase in inadmissible assets."

On page 79, line 23, after the word "excluded", to insert "equity"; in line 24, after the word "subsection", to strike out "(d)" and insert "(e)", and on page 80, line 2, after the word "day.', to strike out "Such property paid in shall be included in an amount equal to its basis (unadjusted) for determining gain upon sale or exchange. If the unadjusted basis of the property is a substituted basis, such basis shall be adjusted, with respect to the period before the property was paid in, by an amount equal to the adjustments proper under section 113 (b) (2)."

On page 80, line 12, after the word "excluded", to insert "equity", and in line 13, after the word "subsection", to strike out "(d)" and insert "(e)."

On page 80, after line 16, to insert:

"(3) The amount, if any, by which the increase in the daily borrowed capital for such day exceeds the increase in the excluded borrowed capital for such day. For the purposes of this paragraph the term 'increase in the daily borrowed capital' for such day means the amount by which the daily borrowed capital for such day (as defined in section 439 (b)) exceeds the daily borrowed capital for the first day of the taxpayers' first taxable year under this subchapter, and the term 'increase in the excluded borrowed capital' for such day means the amount by which the excluded borrowed capital for such day (as defined in subsection (f)) exceeds the excluded borrowed capital for the first day of the taxpayers' first taxable year under this subchapter.

"(d) Daily new capital reduction: The daily new capital reduction for any day of the taxable year shall be the sum of the following:

"(1) Distributions to shareholders previously made during such taxable year which are not out of the earnings and profits of such taxable year; and

"(2) The amount, if any, by which the equity capital at the beginning of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter plus the total amount of excluded equity capital paid in after the beginning of such first taxable year and before the beginning of the taxable year exceeds the amount of the equity capital at the beginning of the taxable year; and

"(3) The amount, if any, by which the daily borrowed capital (as defined in section 439 (b)) for the first day of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter exceeds the daily borrowed capital for such day."

On page 81, line 24, to reletter the subsection from "(d)" to "(e)"; on page 82, line 1, after the word "excluded", to insert "equity"; and on page 83, line 6, to strike out "In determining the amount of any property so paid in, such property shall be included in an amount determined in the manner provided in subsection (c) (1)."

On page 83, after line 9, to insert:

"(f) Definition of excluded borrowed capital: The term 'excluded borrowed capital' for any day of any taxable year means so much of the daily borrowed capital for such day as consists of outstanding indebtedness to a member of a controlled group, as defined in subsection (e) (2), which includes the taxpayer."

On page 83, after line 15, to strike out:

"SEC. 439. Borrowed capital credit.

"(a) Amount of credit—general rule: Except as provided in subsection (b), the borrowed capital credit shall be an amount equal to one-third of the deduction allowable for such year with respect to interest on borrowed capital plus one-third of the interest element accrued or paid, if not allowable as an interest deduction, on conditional sales contracts; except that such credit shall in no case (1) exceed an amount equal to 3 per centum of the average borrowed capital for such year as computed under subsection (c) or (2) be less than an amount equal to 1 per centum of the average borrowed capital for such year as computed under subsection (c) excluding from the computation of the daily borrowed capital for any day any indebtedness evidenced by an obligation the original maturity of which was for a term of less than 5 years.

"(b) Insurance companies: In the case of an insurance company, the borrowed capital credit for any taxable year shall be the sum of the following:

"(1) the amount of the credit allowed under subsection (a), plus,

"(2) an amount equal to 1 per centum of the mean of the pro rata unearned premiums, determined at the beginning and end of the taxable year, plus,

"(3) in the case of a life insurance company an amount equal to one-third of the sum of:

"(A) the product of (i) the mean of the amount of the adjusted life insurance reserves, determined at the beginning and end of the taxable year, and (ii) its average rate of interest assumed in computing such reserves, plus

"(B) the product of (i) the mean of the amount of the reserves on insurance contracts (or contracts arising out of insurance or annuity contracts) which do not involve, at the time with reference to which the computation was made, life, health, or accident contingencies, determined at the beginning and end of the taxable year, and (ii) its average rate of interest assumed in computing such reserves.

The average rate of interest assumed by the taxpayer during the taxable year shall be calculated in the manner provided in section 201 (c) (4).

"(c) Definition of borrowed capital.—

"(1) Average borrowed capital: The average borrowed capital for any taxable year shall be the aggregate of the daily borrowed capital for each day of such taxable year, divided by the number of days in such taxable year.

"(2) Daily borrowed capital: The daily borrowed capital for any day of any taxable year shall be the amount, as of the beginning of such day, of the outstanding indebtedness (not including interest) of the taxpayer, which is evidenced by a bond, note, bill of exchange, debenture, certificate of indebtedness, mortgage, deed of trust, or conditional sales contract. In the case of property of the taxpayer subject to a mortgage or other lien, the amount of indebtedness secured by such mortgage or lien shall be considered as an indebtedness of the taxpayer whether or not the taxpayer assumed or agreed to pay such indebtedness."

And insert:

"SEC. 439. Borrowed capital.

"(a) Average borrowed capital: For the purposes of this subchapter, the average borrowed capital for any taxable year shall be the aggregate of the daily borrowed capital for each day of such taxable year, divided by the number of days in such taxable year.

"(b) Daily borrowed capital: For the purposes of this subchapter, the daily borrowed capital for any day of any taxable year shall be determined as of the beginning of such day and shall be the sum of the following:

"(1) The amount of the outstanding indebtedness (not including interest) of the taxpayer, incurred in good faith for the purposes of the business, which is evidenced by a bond, note, bill of exchange, debenture, certificate of indebtedness, mortgage, deed of trust, bank-loan agreement, or conditional sales contract. In the case of property of the taxpayer subject to a mortgage or other lien, the amount of indebtedness secured by such mortgage or lien shall be considered as an indebtedness of the taxpayer whether or not the taxpayer assumed or agreed to pay such indebtedness, plus

"(2) In the case of an insurance company, an amount equal to 50 percent of the mean of the amount of the pro rata unearned premiums determined at the beginning and end of the taxable year, plus,

"(3) In the case of a life insurance company, an amount equal to 50 percent of the mean of the amount of the adjusted reserves, and an amount equal to 50 percent of the mean of the amount of the reserves on insurance or annuity contracts (or contracts arising out of insurance or annuity contracts) which do not involve, at the time with reference to which the computation was made, life, health, or accident contingencies, determined at the beginning and end of the taxable year; plus

"(4) In the case of a face-amount certificate company as defined in section 4 (1) of the Investment Company Act of 1940 (15 U. S. C., sec. 80a-4), an amount equal to 50 percent of the mean of the amount of reserves on its outstanding investment certificates, determined at the beginning and end of the taxable year."

On page 88, beginning with line 11, to strike out "The amount by which the sum referred to in section 436 shall be reduced for any taxable year shall be an amount which is the same percentage of such sum" and insert "In the case of any amount which is required to be reduced by reference to this subsection, the reduction shall be the same percentage of such amount"; and in line 23, after the word "made", to insert "as of the beginning of each day."

On page 89, after line 2, to strike out:

SEC. 441. Foreign corporations and corporations entitled to benefits of section 251—invested capital

"(a) Computation of credit: Notwithstanding section 436, in the case of a foreign corporation engaged in a trade or business within the United States, and in the case of a corporation entitled to the benefits of section 251, the excess profits credit computed under section 436 shall be determined in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary, under which—

"(1) General rule: The excess profits credit shall be the basic equity capital credit computed under section 437, reduced by the amount computed under section 440 (relating to inadmissible assets). In computing the basic equity capital credit for the purposes of this section (A) the adjusted equity capital for any taxable year shall be the aggregate of the equity captial as of the beginning of each day of such taxable year divided by the number of days in such year, (B) the term 'assets' as used in section 437 (c) shall be considered as referring to United States assets, and (C) the term 'liabilities' as used in such section shall be considered as referring to United States liabilities. In the application of section 440, the terms 'admissible assets' and 'inadmissible assets' shall include only United States assets.

"(2) Exception: If the Secretary determines that the United States assets of the taxpayer cannot satisfactorily be segregated from its other assets or that the United States liabilities of the taxpayer cannot satisfactorily be segregated from its other liabilities, the adjusted equity capital of the taxpayer shall be an amount (in lieu of the amount ascertained under paragraph (1)) which is the same percentage of the equity capital of the taxpayer, determined under section 437 (c) as of the end of the last day of the taxable year without the application of this paragraph, which the net income for the taxable year from sources within the United States is of the total net income of the taxpayer for such year.

"(b) Definitions: As used in this section—

"(1) the term 'United States assets' means assets held by the taxpayer in the United States, determined in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary.

"(2) the term 'United States liabilities' means the liabilities of the taxpayer which are directly related to its United States assets, determined in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary."

On page 91, after line 3, to insert:

"SEC. 441. Rules for determining credit.

"For the purposes of this section, section 435, section 437, section 438, and section 440—

"(a) Equity capital: The term 'equity capital' means the equity capital as defined in section 437 (c).

"(b) Property paid-in: For the purpose of determining the amount of property paid in for stock, or as paid-in surplus, or as a contribution to capital, such property shall be included in an amount equal to its basis (unadjusted) for determining gain upon sale or exchange. If the unadjusted basis of the property is a substituted basis, such basis shall be adjusted, with respect to the period before the property was paid in, by an amount equal to the adjustments proper under section 113 (b) (2).

"(c) Money and property paid-in: For the purpose of determining the amount of money and property paid in for stock, or as paid-in surplus, or as a contribution to capital, there shall be included only money and property paid in good faith for the purposes of the taxpayer's business.

"(d) Distributions to shareholders: A distribution by a corporation of its stock or rights to acquire its stock shall not be regarded as money or property paid in for stock, or as paid-in surplus, or as a contribution to capital, and such a distribution shall not be considered as a distribution by a corporation to its shareholders.

"(e) Distributions in first 60 days of taxable year: So much of the distributions (taken in the order of time) to shareholders made during the first 60 days of any taxable year as does not exceed the accumulated earnings and profits as of the beginning thereof (computed without regard to this paragraph) shall be considered to have been made on the last day of the preceding taxable year. This paragraph shall not apply with respect to distributions made during the first 60 days of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter.

"(f) Computation of earnings and profits of taxable year: In determining whether a distribution is out of the earnings and profits of any taxable year, such earnings and profits shall be computed as of the close of such taxable year without diminution by reason of any distribution made during such taxable year or by reason of the tax under this chapter for such year and the determination shall be made without regard to the amount of earnings and profits at the time the distribution was made.

"(g) Exchanges: For the purpose of determining the amount of property paid in for stock, or as paid-in surplus, or as a contribution to capital—

"(1) If the basis (unadjusted) of the property for determining gain upon a sale or exchange is determined by reference to the basis of the property in the hands of the transferor, proper adjustment shall be made for the amount of any liability of the transferor assumed upon the exchange and of any liability subject to which such property was so received, for the amount of any other liability of the taxpayer constituting consideration for the property so received, and for the aggregate of the amount of money and the fair market value of other property (other than such stock and other than such liabilities) transferred to the transferor.

"(2) If an indebtedness of the taxpayer is canceled or released in exchange for stock, or as paid-in surplus, or as a contribution to capital, the amount paid in shall be considered equal to the amount of the indebtedness.

"(h) Election under section 455: In the case of a taxpayer electing under section 455, the invested capital, the net new capital addition, the base period capital addition, determined under section 435 (f), and the net capital addition or reduction determined under section 435 (g) shall be computed in a manner consistent with the method of accounting so elected, except as to installment sales made (or installment sales obligations acquired) prior to the first taxable year under this subchapter in the case of a taxpayer electing under section 455 (a), and except as to contracts begun before the first taxable year under this subchapter in the case of a taxpayer electing under section 455 (b).

"(i) Effect of intangible property on determination of credit: In the case of intangible property, the basis (unadjusted) and the adjusted basis for determining gain upon sale or exchange shall be determined without regard to the value of the property as of March 1, 1913. For the purposes of this subsection, the term 'intangible property' means secret processes and formulae, good will, trade-marks, trade brands, franchises, and other like property. The provisions of this subsection shall not apply in determining the amount of gain realized upon the sale, exchange, or other disposition of such property.

"(j) Improvements by lessee to properties of lessor railroad corporation: For the purposes of section 437 (c), the fair value of additions and betterments made by the lessee to the physical properties of a lessor railroad corporation which have become the property of the lessor corporation by rejection of its lease (such fair value being determined as of the date such additions and betterments became the property of the lessor) shall be included in determining the basis (unadjusted) of such property; and where the value of such improvements cannot be accurately determined by the old records thereof, because lost, incomplete, or inaccurate, the value of such improvements determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission for rate-making purposes shall be used in lieu of such fair value."

On page 95, after line 4, to strike out:

"SEC. 442. Average base period net income—abnormalities during base period.

"(a) General: If for any taxable year within, or beginning or ending within, the base period a taxpayer which commenced business prior to January 1, 1946, establishes that:

"(1) normal production, output, or operation was interrupted or diminished because of the occurrence, either immediately prior to, or during such taxable years, of events unusual and peculiar in the experience of such taxpayer, or

"(2) the business of the taxpayer was depressed because of temporary economic circumstances unusual in the case of such taxpayer, and if the amount determined under subsection (c) exceeds 110 percent of the excess profits net income for the 12 calendar months in which an abnormality is determined to exist under this subsection and if no such abnormality is determined to exist for at least one period of 12 calendar months exclusive of the 12-month period eliminated under subsection (b) (2), the taxpayer's average base period net income shall be the amount determined in accordance with the provisions of this section or section 435, whichever is higher.

"(b) Average base period net income: The average base period net income determined under this section shall be determined as follows:

"(1) By computing the excess profits net income or deficit in excess profits net income for each month in the base period. The excess profits net income or the deficit in excess profits net income for any month shall be the excess profits net income or deficit in excess profits net income, as the case may be, for the taxable year in which such month falls divided by the number of calendar months in such year.

"(2) By eliminating from the base period whichever of the 12-month periods corresponding to the calendar year the elimination of which produces the highest remaining aggregate excess profits net income or the lowest aggregate deficit in excess profits net income.

"(3) By substituting for the aggregate excess profits net income or aggregate deficit in excess profits net income, as the case may be, of any remaining 12-month period corresponding to the calendar year an amount determined under subsection (c).

"(4) By computing the aggregate of the excess-profits net income, or substitute excess-profits net income, for each of the 36 months remaining in the base period, reduced by the sum of the deficits in excess-profits net income for each of such months.

"(5) By dividing by three the amount ascertained under paragraph (4).

"(c) Adjustment: The excess-profits net income for any 12 calendar months in which an abnormality is determined to exist under subsection (a) shall be an amount which bears the same relation to the aggregate of the taxpayer's excess-profits net income for the remaining calendar months of the base period in which no abnormality has been determined to exist (exclusive of the 12-month period eliminated under subsection (b) (2)) as the taxpayer's industry index for the calendar months in which the abnormality has been determined to exist bears to the aggregate of the taxpayer's industry indices for such remaining calendar months.

"(d) Taxpayer's industry index: For purposes of this section the taxpayer's industry index for any 12 calendar months in the base period shall be the index proclaimed by the Secretary in accordance with the provisions of section 445 for that industry classification to which is attributable the largest amount of the taxpayer's average monthly gross receipts for such 12 calendar months.

"(e) Gross receipts: As used in this section 'average monthly gross receipts' with respect to any period means the figure ascertained as follows:

"(1) By computing the total amount received or accrued during such period from the sale, exchange, or other disposition of stock in trade of the taxpayer or other property of a kind which would properly be included in the inventory of the taxpayer if on hand at the close of the taxable year, or property held by the taxpayer primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of its trade or business;

"(2) By computing the gross income, attributable to a trade or business regularly carried on by the taxpayer, received or accrued during such period, excluding therefrom—

"(A) Gross income derived from the sale, exchange, or other disposition of property;

"(B) Gross income derived from discharge of indebtedness of the taxpayer;

"(C) Dividends on stocks of corporations; and

"(D) Income attributable to recovery of bad debts; and

"(3) By dividing the sum of the amounts computed under paragraphs (1) and (2) by the number of months in such period.

In the event that a taxable year falls partly within such period, there shall be allocated, for the purposes of paragraphs (1) and (2), to the portion of the period within such year an amount of the total gross receipts (as defined in such paragraphs) for such year in the same proportion as the number of months in such year within the period bears to the total number of months in such year.

"(f) Rules for application of section: The taxpayer shall compute its tax, file its return, and pay the tax shown on its return under this subchapter without the application of this section, except as provided in section 430 (d). The benefits of this section shall not be allowed unless the taxpayer within the period of time prescribed by section 322 and subject to the limitation as to amount of credit or refund prescribed in such section makes application therefor in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary. If average base-period net income has been determined under the provisions of this section for any taxable year, the Secretary may by regulations prescribe the extent to which this subsection may be waived for purposes of determining the tax under this subchapter for a subsequent taxable year."

At the top of page 100, to insert:

"SEC. 442. Average base period net income—abnormalities during base period.

"(a) In general: If a taxpayer which commenced business on or before the first day of its base period establishes that, for any taxable year within, or beginning or ending within, its base period:

"(1) normal production, output, or operation was interrupted or diminished because of the occurence, either immediately prior to, or during such taxable year, of events unusual and peculiar in the experience of such taxpayer, or

"(2) the business of the taxpayer was depressed because of temporary economic circumstances unusual in the case of such taxpayer, the taxpayer's average base period net income determined under this section shall be the amount computed under subsection (c) or (d), whichever is applicable.

"(b) Period subject to adjustment: The period subject to adjustment under this section shall be determined as follows:

"(1) By computing the excess profits net income or deficit in excess profits net income for each month in the base period. The excess profits net income or the deficit in excess profits net income for any month shall be the excess profits net income or deficit in excess profits net income, as the case may be, for the taxable year in which such month falls divided by the number of calendar months in such year.

"(2) By eliminating from the base period whichever of the following 12 months results in the higher remaining aggregate excess profits net income or the lower remaining aggregate deficit in excess profits net income—

"(A) The 12 consecutive months the elimination of which produces the highest remaining aggregate excess profits net income, or the lowest remaining aggregate deficit in excess profits net income, or

"(B) The 12 months which remain after retaining in the base period the 36 consecutive months which produce the highest remaining aggregate excess profits net income or the lowest remaining aggregate deficit in excess profits net income.

"(c) Twelve or fewer months affected by abnormalties: If no more than 12 of the months remaining after the application of subsection (b) (2) fall within taxable years the excess profits net income of which was reduced (or the deficit in excess profits net income of which was increased) by reason of an abnormality determined to exist under subsection (a), the average base period net income determined under this section shall be computed as follows:

"(1) by computing the excess profits net income, determined in accordance with section 435 (d) (1), for each of the 36 months remaining after the application of subsection (b) (2) of this section.

"(2) By computing, for each such month which falls within any taxable year the excess-profits net income of which was reduced (or the deficit in excess-profits net income of which was increased) by reason of an abnormality determined to exist under subsection (a), the substitute excess-profits net income provided under subsection (e).

"(3) By identifying the months described in paragraph (2) for which the amount of the substitute excess profits net income ascertained under such paragraph exceeds 110 percent of the amount of the excess-profits net income ascertained under paragraph (1).

"(4) By computing the sum of (A) the aggregate of the substitute excess-profits net income for each of the months identified under paragraph (3) and (B) the aggregate of the excess-profits net income (ascertained under paragraph (1)) for each of the other months remaining after the application of subsection (b) (2).

"(5) By dividing by 3 the amount ascertained under paragraph (4).

"(d) More than 12 months affected by abnormalities: If more than 12 of the months remaining after the application of subsection (b) (2) fall within taxable years the excess-profits net income of which was reduced (or the deficit in excess-profits net income of which was increased) by reason of an abnormality determined to exist under subsection (a), the average base-period net income determined under this section shall be computed as follows:

"(1) By determining the amount of the taxpayer's total assets for the last day of each of its taxable years ending after the first day of its base period and prior to the first day of its first taxable year under this subchapter.

"(2) By computing the average of the amounts ascertained under paragraph (1).

"(3) By multiplying the amount ascertained under paragraph (2) by the base-period rate of return, proclaimed by the Secretary under section 447, for the taxpayer's industry classification.

"(4) By determining the aggregate amount of interest paid or incurred by the taxpayer for all taxable years ending after the first day of its base period and prior to the first day of its first taxable year under this subchapter, dividing such aggregate by the total number of months in such years, and multiplying the quotient by 12.

"(5) By subtracting the amount ascertained under paragraph (4) from the amount ascertained under paragraph (3).

"This subsection shall have no application with respect to any taxpayer unless the amount of the taxpayer's average base period net income determined under this subsection exceeds 110 percent of the taxpayer's average base-period net income computed under section 435 (d).

"(e) Substitute excess-profits net income.—

"(1) Computation: For the purposes of subsection (c) (2), the substitute excess profits net income for any month shall be computed as follows:

"(A) By multiplying the amount of the taxpayer's total assets for the last day of the taxable year in which such month falls or for the last day of its taxable year immediately preceding its first taxable year under this subchapter, whichever day is earlier, by the rate of return provided under paragraph (2).

"(B) By reducing the amount ascertained under subparagraph (A) by the total interest paid or incurred by the taxpayer for the 12 months beginning with the first day of the taxable year within which such month falls.

"(C) By dividing by 12 the amount ascertained under subparagraph (B).

"(2) Base period yearly rate of return: The rate of return to be used under paragraph (1) (A) shall be the base period yearly rate of return, proclaimed by the Secretary under section 447 for the taxpayer's industry classification, for the following year—

"(A) in the case of a taxable year of the taxpayer beginning in 1945 and ending in 1946—for the year 1946;

"(B) in the case of a taxable year of the taxpayer beginning in 1949 and ending in 1950—for the year 1949; and

"(C) in the case of any other taxable year of the taxpayer—for the year in which falls the greater number of days in such taxable year.

"(f) Total assets: For the purposes of this section, the taxpayer's total assets for any day shall be determined as of the end of such day and shall be an amount equal to the sum of the cash and the property (other than cash, inadmissible assets, and loans to members of a controlled group as defined in section 435 (f) (4)) held by the taxpayer in good faith for the purposes of the business. Such property shall be included in an amount equal to its adjusted basis for determining gain upon sale or exchange, determined under the rules provided in section 441.

"(g) Taxpayer's industry classification: The taxpayer's industry classification shall be determined, for the purposes of subsection (d), by reference to the last taxable year within or beginning within its base period, and, for the purposes of subsection (e), by reference to the taxable year within which falls the last month for which a substitute excess profits net income is determined; and, in either case, shall be the industry classification under section 447 to which is attributable the largest amount of the taxpayer's gross receipts for such taxable year.

"(h) Rules for application of section: The benefits of this section shall not be allowed unless the taxpayer makes application therefor in accordance with section 447 (e).

"(i) Cross references.—

"(1) For definition of gross receipts, see section 435 (e) (5).

"(2) For computation of capital additions in the base period, see section 435 (f) (3).

"(3) For computation of excess profits credit based on income in the case of certain reorganizations, see part II of this subchapter."

"SEC. 443. Change in product or services.

"(a) In general: In the case of any taxpayer which commenced business on or before January 1, 1946, and which establishes that—

"(1) during the 36-month period ending December 31, 1949, there was a substantial change in the products or in the services furnished,

"(2) more than 33⅓ percent of its net income for any one of the three consecutive taxable years immediately following the taxable year in which the change referred to in paragraph (1) occurred is attributable to such changed products or services, and

"(3) its net income for any one of the taxable years in which it has met the requirement of paragraph (2) exceeds 125 percent of its average net income for the taxable year or years which ended after December 31, 1945, and prior to the taxable year in which such change occurred, its average base period net income for each excess-profits tax taxable year, beginning with the year in which the change in product or service was made, shall be the amount computed in accordance with subsection (b) or section 435 (adjusted in a manner consistent with the provisions of subsection (g) of this section, relating to the exclusion of certain capital additions and reductions), whichever is the larger.

"(b) Average base period net income: The average base period net income determined under this section shall be computed as follows:

"(1) If the taxable year in which the taxpayer met the requirements of subsections (a) (2) and (3) ends prior to January 1, 1950, by multiplying the amount of the taxpayer's total assets for December 31, 1949, by the base period rate of return for the taxpayer's industry;

"(2) If the taxable year in which the taxpayer met the requirements of subsections (a) (2) and (3) ends subsequent to December 31, 1949, by multiplying the amount of the taxpayer's total assets for the last day of such taxable year by the base period rate of return for the taxpayer's industry.

"(c) Total assets: For the purposes of this section the taxpayer's total assets for any day shall be determined as of the end of such day and shall be an amount equal to the sum of the cash and the property other than cash used in the taxpayer's business. Such property shall be included in an amount equal to its adjusted basis for determining gain upon sale or exchange.

"(d) Taxpayer's industry classification: For purposes of this section the taxpayer's industry classification for any day shall be that industry classification proclaimed by the Secretary in accordance with the provisions of section 445 to which is attributable the largest amount of the taxpayer's gross receipts for the taxable year which includes such day.

"(e) Base period rate of return: For purposes of this section the base period rate of return for any excess profits tax taxable year shall be that rate of return for the taxpayer's industry classification proclaimed by the Secretary in accordance with the provisions of section 445.

"(f) Gross receipts: As used in this section the term 'gross receipts' when used with respect to any period means the sum of the following:

"(1) The total amount received or accrued during such period from the sale, exchange, or other disposition of stock in trade of the taxpayer or other property of a kind which would properly be included in the inventory of the taxpayer if on hand at the close of a taxable year, or property held by the taxpayer primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of its trade or business, and

"(2) The gross income, attributable to a trade or business regularly carried on by the taxpayer, received or accrued during such period, excluding therefrom—

"(A) Gross income derived from the sale, exchange, or other disposition of property;

"(B) Gross income derived from discharge of indebtedness of the taxpayer;

"(C) Dividends on stock of corporations; and

"(D) Income attributable to recovery of bad debts.

"(g) Capital additions and capital reductions: In determining the net capital addition or the net capital reduction, as the case may be, of a corporation the excess profits tax liability of which has been determined by employing average base period net income computed in accordance with this section, no regard shall be had to any capital addition or capital reduction made on or prior to the day for which the total assets of the taxpayer were determined.

"(h) Rules for application of section: The taxpayer shall compute its tax, file its return, and pay the tax shown on its return under this subchapter without the application of this section, except as provided in section 430 (d). The benefits of this section shall not be allowed unless the taxpayer within the period of time prescribed by section 322 and subject to the limitation as to amount of credit or refund prescribed in such section makes application therefor in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary. If average base period net income has been determined under the provisions of this section for any taxable year, the Secretary may by regulations prescribe the extent to which this subsection may be waived for purposes of determining the tax under this subchapter for a subsequent taxable year."

And insert:

"SEC. 443. Average base period net income—Change in products or services.

"(a) In general: If a taxpayer which commenced business on or before the first day of its base period establishes with respect to any taxable year that—

"(1) During so much of its three immediately preceding taxable years as falls within the 36-month period ending on the last day of its base period, there was a substantial change in the products or services furnished by the taxpayer,

"(2) More than 40 percent of its gross income for such taxable year is attributable to one or more of the new products or services, and

"(3) Its average monthly excess profits net income (determined under subsection (e)) for such taxable year exceeds 125 percent of its average monthly excess profits net income (determined under subsection (e)) for the taxable years ending within its base period and prior to the taxable year in which the first change to which gross income is attributed for the purpose of this subsection occurred.

then, in computing its excess profits credit for taxable years under this subchapter which end on or after the last day of the earliest taxable year with respect to which the requirements of paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) are satisfied, its average base period net income determined under this section shall be the amount computed under subsection (b).

"(b) Average base period net income: The average base period net income determined under this section shall be computed as follows:

"(1) By multiplying the amount of the taxpayer's total assets for (A) the last day of its taxable year immediately preceding its first taxable year under this subchapter, or (B) the last day of the taxable year in which the taxpayer first meets the requirements of subsection (a), whichever day is later, by the base period rate of return, proclaimed by the Secretary under section 447, for the taxpayer's industry classification.

"(2) By subtracting from the amount ascertained under paragraph (1) the total interest paid or incurred by the taxpayer for the 12 months ending with whichever day is used under such paragraph.

"(c) Taxpayer's industry classification: For the purposes of this section, the taxpayer's industry classification shall be the industry classification under section 447 to which is attributable the largest amount of the taxpayer's gross receipts for the taxable year which includes whichever day is used under subsection (b).

"(d) Capital addition or reduction: If the average base period net income of the taxpayer is determined under this section—

"(1) the excess profits credit for the taxable year in which the taxpayer first meets the requirements of subsection (a) shall not include any net capital addition or reduction determined under section 435 (g), and

"(2) in determining the net capital addition or reduction under section 435 (g) for any subsequent taxable year, the expression 'the first day of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter' shall be read as 'the first day of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter or the day following the close of the taxable year in which the taxpayer first met the requirements of section 443 (a), whichever day is later'.

"(e) Average monthly excess profits net income: For the purposes of subsection (a) (3)— "(1) The excess profits net income for any year shall be computed by making the adjustments provided in section 433 (b) as though such section were applicable to all taxable years.

"(2) The average monthly excess profits net income for any period of two or more taxable years shall be determined (A) by computing the aggregate of the excess profits net income for all taxable years within such period, (B) by subtracting from such aggregate the aggregate amount of the deficits in excess profits net income for all taxable years within such period, and (C) by dividing the amount ascertained under (B) by the total number of months in such taxable years.

"(3) The average monthly excess profits net income determined for any period shall in no case be less than zero.

"(f) Rules for application of section: The benefits of this section shall not be allowed unless the taxpayer makes application therefor in accordance with section 447 (e).

"(g) Cross references.—

"(1) For definition of gross receipts, see section 435 (e) (5).

"(2) For definition of total assets, see section 442 (f).

"(3) For computation of excess profits credit based on income in the case of certain reorganization, see part II of this subchapter."

At the top of page 115, to insert:

"SEC. 444. Average base period net income—Increase in capacity for production or operation.

"(a) In general: If a taxpayer which commenced business on or before the first day of its base period establishes that, during the 36-month period ending on the last day of its base period, there was an increase, as defined in subsection (b), in its capacity for production or operation, the taxpayer's average base period net income determined under this section shall be the amount computed under subsection (c).

"(b) Increase in capacity: An increase in capacity for production or operation shall be deemed to have occurred, for the purposes of this section, if the taxpayer establishes that it made an addition or additions to its facilities (as defined in subsection (d)) or replaced all or a part of its existing facilities, and that:

"(1) as a result of such additions or replacements, its capacity for production or operation on the last day of its base period was 200 per centum or more of its capacity for production or operation on the day prior to the beginning of such 36-month period, or

"(2) (A) as a result of such additions or replacements, its capacity for production or operation on the last day of its base period was 150 per centum or more of its capacity for production or operation on the day prior to the beginning of such 36-month period, and (B) the adjusted basis for determining gain upon sale or exchange of its total facilities on the last day of its base period was 150 per centum or more of the adjusted basis for determining gain upon sale or exchange of its total facilities on the day prior to the beginning of such 36-month period, or

"(3) the basis (unadjusted) for determining gain upon sale or exchange of its total facilities on the last day of its base period was 200 per centum or more of the basis (unadjusted) for determining gain upon sale or exchange of its total facilities on the day prior to the beginning of such 36-month period.

"(c) Average base period net income: The average base period net income determined under this section shall be computed as follows:

"(1) By multiplying the amount of the taxpayer's total assets for the last day of its taxable year immediately preceding its first taxable year under this subchapter by the base period rate of return, proclaimed by the Secretary under section 445, for the taxpayer's industry.

"(2) By subtracting from the amount ascertained under paragraph (1) an amount equal to the total interest paid or incurred by the taxpayer for the 12 months ending with the end of such immediately preceding taxable year.

"(d) Facilities: For the purposes of this section, the term 'facilities' means real property and depreciable tangible property, held by the taxpayer in good faith for the purposes of the business.

"(e) Taxpayer's industry classification: For the purposes of this section, the taxpayer's industry classification shall be the industry classification under section 447 to which is attributable the largest amount of the taxpayer's gross receipts for its taxable year immediately preceding its first taxable year under this subchapter.

"(f) Rules for application of section: The benefits of this section shall not be allowed unless the taxpayer makes application therefor in accordance with section 447 (e).

"(g) Cross references:

"(1) For definition of gross receipts, see section 435 (e) (5).

"(2) For definition of total assets, see section 442 (f).

"(3) For computation of excess-profits credit based on income in the case of certain reorganizations, see part II of this subchapter."

On page 118, line 1, to change the section number from "444" to "445."

On page 118, line 4, after the word "the", to strike out "beginning of its base period, and which is not an acquiring corporation of a component corporation which was in existence (as determined under section 461 (d)) prior to the beginning of such base period, shall be a new corporation for purposes of this section and its average base period net income shall be the amount determined in accordance with subsection (b) or section 435 (adjusted in a manner consistent with the provisions of subsection (f) of this section, relating to the exclusion of certain capital additions and reductions), whichever is the larger" and insert "first day of its base period shall, except as provided in subsection (g), be considered a new corporation for the purposes of this section, and its average base period net income determined under this section shall be the amount computed under subsection (b)."

On page 118, after line 21, to strike out:

"(1) For the taxpayer's first taxable year, if such taxable year is an excess-profits-tax taxable year, by multiplying the amount of the taxpayer's total assets for the last day of such taxable year by the base-period rate of return for the taxpayer's industry;

"(2) For the taxpayer's second taxable year, if such taxable year is an excess-profits-tax taxable year, by multiplying the amount of the taxpayer's total assets for the last day of such taxable year by the base-period rate of return for the taxpayer's industry;

"(3) For the taxpayer's third taxable year, if such taxable year is an excess-profits-tax taxable year, by multiplying the amount of the taxpayer's total assets for the last day of such taxable year by the base-period rate of return for the taxpayer's industry;

"(4) For the taxpayer's fourth taxable year and for succeeding taxable years, if such fourth and succeeding taxable years are excess-profits-tax taxable years, by multiplying the amount of the taxpayer's total assets for the last day of the taxpayer's third taxable year, or for December 31, 1949, whichever day is later, by the base-period rate of return for the taxpayer's industry.

"(c) Total assets: For the purposes of this section the taxpayer's total assets for any day shall be determined as of the end of such day and shall be an amount equal to the sum of the cash and the property other than cash used in the taxpayer's business. Such property shall be included in an amount equal to its adjusted basis for determining gain upon sale or exchange.

"(d) Taxpayer's industry classification: For purposes of this section the taxpayer's industry classification for any day shall be that industry classification proclaimed by the Secretary in accordance with the provisions of section 445 to which is attributable the largest amount of the taxpayer's gross receipts for the taxable year which includes such day, except that the industry classification applicable to the taxable year in which falls the thirty-fifth month following the month in which the taxpayer commenced business shall apply to all succeeding excess-profits-tax taxable years.

"(e) Base-period rate of return: For purposes of this section the base-period rate of return for any excess-profits-tax taxable year shall be that rate of return for the taxpayer's industry classification proclaimed by the Secretary in accordance with the provisions of section 445.

"(f) Capital additions and capital reductions: In determining the net capital addition or the net capital reduction, as the case may be, of any new corporation the excess-profits-tax liability of which has been determined by employing average base-period net income computed in accordance with this section, no regard shall be had to any capital addition or capital reduction made on or prior to the day for which the total assets of the taxpayer were determined.

"(g) Gross receipts: As used in this section the term 'gross receipts' when used with respect to any period means the amount computed as follows:

"(1) By computing the total amount received or accrued during such period from the sale, exchange, or other disposition of stock in trade of the taxpayer or other property of a kind which would properly be included in the inventory of the taxpayer if on hand at the close of the taxable year, or property held by the taxpayer primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of its trade or business,

"(2) By computing the gross income, attributable to a trade or business regularly carried on by the taxpayer, received or accrued during such period, excluding therefrom—

"(A) Gross income derived from the sale, exchange, or other disposition of property;

"(B) Gross income derived from discharge of indebtedness of the taxpayer;

"(C) Dividends on stocks of corporations; and

"(D) Income attributable to recovery of bad debts."

And insert:

"(1) For the purpose of determining the excess-profits credit for any of the taxpayer's first three taxable years which is a taxable year under this subchapter—

"(A) By multiplying the amount of the total assets for such taxable year (determined under subsection (c)), held by the taxpayer in good faith for the purposes of the business, by the base period rate of return, proclaimed by the Secretary under section 447, for the taxpayer's industry classification.

"(B) By subtracting from the amount ascertained under subparagraph (A) the total interest paid or incurred by the taxpayer for the 12 months ending with the last day of such taxable year.

"(2) For the purpose of determining the excess-profits credit for any taxable year under this subchapter other than a taxable year described in paragraph (1)—

"(A) By multiplying the amount of the taxpayer's total assets (as defined in section 442 (f)) for (i) the last day of its taxable year immediately preceding its first taxable year under this subchapter, or (ii) the last day of its third taxable year, whichever day is later, by the base period rate of return, proclaimed by the Secretary under section 447, for the taxpayer's industry classification.

"(B) By subtracting from the amount ascertained under subparagraph (A) the total interest paid or incurred by the taxpayer for the 12 months ending with whichever day is used under such subparagraph.

For the purposes of this section, the taxable year of the taxpayer in which it commenced business and its two succeeding taxable years shall be considered to be its first three taxable years.

"(c) Total assets for first 3 years: The amount of the total assets for any taxable year referred to in subsection (b) (1), shall, for the purposes of such subsection, be the sum of

"(1) the total assets (as defined in section 442 (f)) for the last day of the taxpayer's taxable year immediately preceding its first taxable year under this subchapter, and

"(2) the net capital addition (determined under section 435 (g)) for such taxable year referred to in subsection (b) (1).

minus the net capital reduction (determined under section 435 (g)) for such taxable year referred to in subsection (b) (1).

"(d) Taxpayer's industry classification: The taxpayer's industry classification shall be determined, for the purposes of subsection (b) (1), by reference to the particular taxable year for which the excess-profits credit is thereunder determined, and, for the purposes of subsection (b) (2), by reference to the taxpayer's third taxable year; and, in either case, shall be the industry classification under section 447 to which is attributable the largest amount of the taxpayer's gross receipts for such taxable year.

"(e) Capital addition or reduction: If the average base period net income of the taxpayer is determined under this section—

"(1) the excess-profits credit for any taxable year for which such determination is made under subsection (b) (1) shall not include any net capital addition or reduction determined under section 435 (g), and

"(2) in computing the net capital addition or reduction under section 435 (g) for any taxable year for which such determination is made under subsection (b) (2), the expression 'the first day of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter' shall be read as 'the first day of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter or the day following the close of the taxpayer's third taxable year, whichever day is later'."

On page 124, line 21, to reletter the subsection from "(h)" to "(f)"; in the same line, after the word "The", to strike out "taxpayer shall compute its tax, file its return, and pay the tax shown on its return under this subchapter without the application of this section, except as provided in section 430 (d). If average base period net income has been determined under the provisions of this section for any taxable year, the Secretary may by regulations prescribe the extent to which this subsection may be waived for purposes of determining the tax under this subchapter for a subsequent taxable year."

On page 125, after line 10, to insert:

"(g) Ineligible corporations:

"(1) If a taxpayer, on or after December 1, 1950, and prior to the end of its third taxable year, acquires any properties in any of the transactions described in paragraph (2), it shall not, for the taxable year in which such acquisition occurs or for succeeding taxable years, be entitled to the benefits of this section except under the circumstances and subject to the limitations provided in section 462 (g).

"(2) The transactions to which paragraph (1) applies are as follows:

"(A) The acquisition by the taxpayer from another corporation of properties the basis of which in its hands is determined by reference to the basis of such properties to the transferor;

"(B) The acquisition by the taxpayer of a substantial part of its assets from another corporation, or of a substantial part of the properties of another corporation, if 50 percent or more in value of the outstanding stock or outstanding voting stock of the taxpayer is directly or indirectly owned, at the time of such acquisition, by individuals owning directly or indirectly 50 percent or more in value of the outstanding stock, or outstanding voting stock of the transferor;

"(C) The aquisition by the taxpayer of a substantial part of the properties distributed on or after December 1, 1950, by another corporation, if such properties constituted a substantial part of the business assets of such other corporation, and if 50 percent or more in value of the outstanding stock or outstanding voting stock of the taxpayer is owned directly or indirectly by individuals who at the time of such distribution owned directly or indirectly 50 percent or more in value of the outstanding stock or outstanding voting stock of such other corporation;

"(3) For the purposes of this subsection, the provisions of section 503 shall be applicable in the determination of ownership of stock.

On page 127, after line 6, to strike out:

"SEC. 445. Industry base period rates of return.

"(a) Industry classification: The Secretary, not later than March 1, 1951, shall determine and proclaim a classification of taxpayers by industry, such classification to be generally in accord with the classification regularly used by the Treasury Department in compiling published statistics from corporation income-tax returns.

"(b) Base period yearly rate of return: The Secretary shall determine and proclaim for each industry classification under subsection (a) the rate of return for each of the four calendar years 1946 through 1949 and indices based thereon. Each such industry base period yearly rate of return shall be obtained by dividing the sum of the aggregate net income and the aggregate interest deduction for all corporations in the particular industry classification filing income-tax returns for such year by the average of the aggregate total assets of such corporations for such year.

"(c) Base period rate of return: The Secretary shall determine and proclaim for each industry classification under subsection (a) the rate of return for the 48-month period ending December 31, 1949, obtained by dividing the sum of the aggregate net income for such period and the aggregate interest deduction for such period for all corporations in the particular industry classification filing income-tax returns for taxable years in such period by the aggregate total assets of such corporations for such period.

"(d) Tentative rates of return: The Secretary, not later than March 1, 1951, shall determine and proclaim for each industry classification, tentative base period yearly rates of return, tentative indices based thereon, and a tentative base period rate of return. Such tentative rates of return shall be effective, subject to the provisions of section 430 (d) concerning deferment of tax, until such time as the base period yearly rates of return and base period rates of return are determined and proclaimed."

On page 128, after line 17, to insert:

"SEC. 446. Average base period net income—depressed industry subgroups.

"(a) In general: If a taxpayer which commenced business on or before the first day of its base period is a member of a depressed industry subgroup, as defined in subsection (c), its average base period net income determined under this section shall be the amount computed under subsection (b).

"(b) Average base period net income: The average base period net income determined under this section shall be computed as follows:

"(1) By determining the amount of the taxpayer's total assets for the last day of each of its taxable years ending after the first day of its base period and prior to the first day of its first taxable year under this subchapter.

"(2) By computing the average of the amounts ascertained under paragraph (1).

"(3) By multiplying the amount ascertained under paragraph (2) by the adjusted rate of return, proclaimed by the Secretary under subsection (d) (2), for the taxpayer's industry subgroup.

"(4) By determining the aggregate amount of interest paid or incurred by the taxpayer for all taxable years ending after the first day of its base period and prior to the first day of its first taxable year under this subchapter, dividing such aggregate by the total number of months in such years, and multiplying the quotient by 12.

"(5) By subtracting the amount ascertained under paragraph (4) from the amount ascertained under paragraph (3).

"(c) Depressed industry subgroups: The Secretary shall determine and proclaim as a depressed industry subgroup any industry subgroup (defined in accordance with subsection (f)) having a rate of return (determined under subsection (d) (1)) for the period 1946 through 1949 which is less than 60 percent of its rate of return (determined under subsection (d) (2) for the period 1936 through 1949.

"(d) Rates of return for industry subgroups:

"(1) Period 1946–49: The rate of return for an industry subgroup for the 4-year period 1946 through 1949 shall be obtained by dividing the sum of the aggregate net income (computed without regard to the net operating loss deduction provided in section 23 (s)) for the 4 years 1946 through 1949 and the aggregate interest deduction for such years shown on the income-tax returns filed by the corporations in such industry subgroup submitting balance sheets, by the aggregate assets for such years of such corporations as of the close of the taxable years for which such returns were filed. Such aggregate net income, interest deduction, and total assets shall include the amounts reported on the income-tax returns for the calendar years 1946, 1947, 1948, and 1949, and the amounts reported on returns for other taxable years the greater part of which falls in such calendar years.

"(2) Period 1936–49: The rate of return for an industry subgroup for the 14-year period 1936 through 1949 shall be determined in the same manner as is provided in paragraph (1) with the substitution of the years 1936 through 1949 for the years 1946 through 1949.

"(e) Adjusted rates of return for depressed industry subgroups: The adjusted rate of return for a depressed industry subgroup shall be a rate equal to four-fifths of the rate of return for such industry subgroup for the 14-year period 1936 through 1949 as determined under subsection (d) (2). The Secretary shall determine and proclaim the adjusted rate of return (computed to the nearest thousandth) for each industry subgroup determined and proclaimed to be depressed under subsection (c).

"(f) Industry subgroups.—For the purposes of this section, industry subgroups shall be generally in accord with the industry subgroups regularly used by the Treasury Department in compiling published statistics from income tax returns, but with such combinations of subgroups as the Secretary determines are necessary to provide reasonably comparable data over the period 1936 through 1949.

"(g) Members of industry subgroup: For the purposes of this section, a taxpayer is a member of an industry subgroup if more than 50 percent of the taxpayer's gross receipts (as defined in section 435 (e) (5)) for the taxable years beginning with or within its base period is attributable to such industry subgroup.

"(h) Tentative determinations of depressed industry subgroups and adjusted rates of return: The Secretary, not later than March 1, 1951, shall proclaim the industry subgroups tentatively determined to be depressed in accordance with subsection (c) and the tentative adjusted rates of return (computed to the nearest thousandth), determined under subsection (d), for such industry subgroups. Such tentative determinations shall be effective until such time as final determinations are proclaimed by the Secretary. Such final determinations shall relate back as though such determinations had been in effect in place of the tentative determinations. If the application of this section is made in accordance with a tentative determination, such application shall be redetermined in accordance with the final determination when proclaimed. The period of limitation prescribed under sections 275, 276, and 322 shall not begin to run with respect to overpayments or deficiencies in tax caused by such redetermination period to such time as the final determination is proclaimed by the Secretary.

"(i) Rules for application of section: The benefits of this section shall not be allowed unless the taxpayer makes application therefor in accordance with section 447 (e). The determinations by the Secretary required under this section shall be made on the basis of returns regularly used by the Treasury Department in compiling published statistics from income tax returns."

On page 133, after line 10, to insert:

"SEC. 447. Industry base period rates of return.

"(a) Base period yearly rate of return: The Secretary shall determine and proclaim for each industry classification in subsection (c) a rate of return (computed to the nearest thousandth) for each of the 4 years 1946 through 1949. The yearly rate of return for each industry classification shall be obtained by dividing the sum of the aggregate net income (computed without regard to the net operating loss deduction provided in section 23 (s)) and the aggregate interest deduction shown on the income-tax returns filed by the corporations in such classification submitting balance sheets, by the aggregate total assets of such corporations as of the close of the taxable year for which such returns were filed. Such aggregate net income, interest deduction and total assets for each such year shall include the amounts reported on the income-tax returns for the calendar year and the amounts reported on returns for other taxable years the greater part of which falls in such calendar year. The determinations by the Secretary required under this section shall be made on the basis of returns regularly used by the Treasury Department in compiling published statistics from income-tax returns.

"(b) Base period rate of return: The Secretary shall determine and proclaim for each industry classification in subsection (c) a rate of return (computed to the nearest thousandth) for the 4-year period 1946 through 1949. Such base period rate of return for each industry classification shall be obtained by aggregating the net income and interest deduction (such amounts being determined as provided under subsection (a)) for such 4 years and dividing the aggregate by the sum of the total assets (determined as provided under subsection (a)) for such 4 years.

"(c) Industry classification: For purposes of this subchapter the classification of taxpayers by industry shall be as provided in the table below. Each such industry classification is defined in accordance with the specifications shown in the Standard Industrial Classification Manual (prepared by the Division of Statistical Standards, Bureau of the Budget) for the major industry group or groups the numbers of which appear opposite such classification.

"(d) Tentative rates of return: The Secretary, not later than March 1, 1951, shall determine and proclaim for each industry classification, tentative base period yearly rates of return and a tentative base period rate of return (each computed to the nearest thousandth). Such tentative rates of return shall be effective until such time as the base period yearly rates of return and base period rates of return are determined and proclaimed. The base period yearly rates of return and base period rates of return, upon proclamation thereof by the Secretary, shall relate back as though such rates had been in effect in place of the tentative rates of return. If the application of section 442, 443, 444, 445, or 446 is made in accordance with tentative rates of return, such application shall be redetermined in accordance with the base period yearly rate of return or the base period rate of return when determined and proclaimed. The period of limitation prescribed under section 322 and sections 275 and 276 shall not begin to run with respect to overpayments or deficiencies in tax caused by such redetermination prior to such time as the base period yearly rates of return and the base period rates of return are determined and proclaimed by the Secretary.

"(e) Application for benefits of section 442, 443, 444, 445, or 446: The tax for any taxable year under this subchapter shall be determined without regard to section 442, 443, 444, 445, or 446 unless an application for the benefits of such section, setting forth the grounds for the application of such section in such detail and in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe, is filed by the taxpayer—

"(A) With its return for the taxable year, or

"(B) Within the period of time prescribed by section 322 (as extended under the last sentence of subsection (d) of this section or of section 446 (h)) for filing claim for credit or refund, and in such case the application of section 442, 443, 444, 445, or 446, shall be subject to the limitations as to amount of credit or refund prescribed in section 322, or

"(C) After the period described in paragraph (B), if within the period of limitations for the assessment of a deficiency (as extended under the last sentence of subsection (d) of this section or of section 446 (h)) in the tax imposed by this chapter for the taxable year, and in such case the application of section 442, 443, 444, 445, or 446 shall not reduce the tax by an amount greater than the deficiency determined without regard to the application of such section, except that if a petition is filed with the Tax Court for the redetermination of the tax under this chapter for the taxable year, the application for the benefits of section 442, 443, 444, 445, or 446, shall be effective only if filed not later than the date on which such petition is filed. Section 442, 443, 444, 445, or 446, shall not be applied upon the basis of any grounds other than those set forth in an application filed within the period prescribed in this subsection."

"(a) The excess profits credit for any taxable year computed under this section shall be the regulated public utilities credit (as defined in subsection (b)) reduced by the amount computed under section 440 (relating to inadmissible assets).

"(b) The regulated public utilities credit for any taxable year shall be an amount which is the sum of the following:

"(1) The tax imposed by sections 13, 14, and 15 for such taxable year, and

"(2) an amount computed by applying to the sum of the following the percent prescribed in subsection (c):

"(A) the adjusted equity capital for such taxable year (as computed under section 437 (b) without regard to the last sentence thereof), and

"(B) the average borrowed capital for such taxable year (as defined in section 439 (c)) less the deduction allowable for such year with respect to interest on indebtedness included in borrowed capital under section 439 (c).

"(c) The percent referred to in subsection (b) (2) shall be—

"(1) 6 percent in the case of a corporation engaged in the furnishing or sale of—

"(A) telephone service, telegraph service, electric energy, gas, or water, or

"(B) transportation (not included in paragraph (3) below) on an intrastate, suburban, municipal, or interurban electric railroad, or on an intrastate, municipal, or suburban trackless trolley system, or a municipal or suburban bus system—

if the rates for such furnishing or sale, as the case may be, have been established or approved by a State or political subdivision thereof, or by an agency or instrumentality of the United States or by a public service or public utility commission or other similar body of the District of Columbia or of any State or political subdivision thereof.

"(2) 6 percent in the case of a corporation engaged as a common carrier in the furnishing or sale of transportation by pipe line of oil or gas, if subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal Power Commission.

"(3) 5 percent in the case of a corporation engaged in the furnishing or sale of transportation by common carrier—

"(A) by railroad, subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or

"(B) by air, subject to the jurisdiction of the Civil Aeronautics Board.

"(d) For the purposes of this subchapter the term 'regulated public utility' means a corporation described in subsection (c) substantially all of whose excess profits net income for the taxable year is derived from sources described in subsection (c)."

"SEC. 448. Excess profits credit—regulated public utilities.

"(a) Amount of credit: In the case of a regulated public utility (as defined in subsection (d)), the excess-profits credit for any taxable year computed under this section shall be the sum of the tax imposed by sections 13, 14, 15, and 141 (c), for such taxable year and the amount determined under subsection (b).

"(b) Computation: The amount referred to in subsection (a) for any taxable year shall be determined as follows:

"(1) by applying to the sum of the following the percent prescribed in subsection (c):

"(A) the adjusted invested capital for such taxable year, and

"(B) the average borrowed capital for such taxable year as defined in section 439.

For the purposes of this paragraph the adjusted invested capital for any taxable year shall be the amount computed for such year under section 437 (b) (2) without reduction by the amount of the net new capital addition; except that in the case of a corporation described in subsection (c) (1) (A), (c) (1) (B), (c) (2), or (c) (4), the corporate books of account of which are maintained in accordance with systems of accounts prescribed by an appropriate regulatory body (or, if not so prescribed, are maintained in accordance with the uniform systems of accounts prescribed by the Federal Power Commission or the National Association of Railway and Utility Commissioners), the adjusted invested capital for such year shall be the sum of the average outstanding common and preferred capital stock accounts and the capital surplus and earned surplus accounts for such taxable year as recorded on such corporate books of account.

"(2) by reducing the amount ascertained under paragraph (1) by the deduction allowable for such year with respect to interest on indebtedness included in borrowed capital under section 439 (c).

"(3) by reducing the amount ascertained under paragraph (2) by the amount computed under section 440 (b) (relating to inadmissible assets).

"(c) The percent referred to in subsection (b) (1) shall be—

"(1) Six percent in the case of a corporation engaged in the furnishing or sale of—

"(A) electric energy, gas, or water, or

"(B) transportation (not included in paragraph (3)) on an intrastate, suburban, municipal, or interurban electric railroad, on an intrastate, municipal, or suburban trackless-trolley system, or on a municipal or suburban-bus system, or

"(C) transportation (not included in subparagraph (A)) by motor vehicle—

if the rates for such furnishing or sale, as the case may be, have been established or approved by a State or political subdivision thereof, by an agency or instrumentality of the United States, or by a public service or public utility commission or other similar body of the District of Columbia or of any State or political subdivision thereof.

"(2) 6 percent in the case of a corporation engaged as a common carrier in the furnishing or sale of transportation of gas by pipeline, if subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Power Commission.

"(3) 6 percent in the case of a corporation engaged as a common carrier in the furnishing or sale of transportation by railroad, or in the furnishing or sale of transportation of oil or other petroleum products by pipeline, subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

"(4) 7 percent in the case of a corporation engaged in the furnishing or sale of telephone or telegraph service, if the rates for such furnishing or sale meet the requirements of paragraph (1).

"(5) 7 percent in the case of a corporation engaged in the furnishing or sale of transportation as a common carrier by air, subject to the jurisdiction of the Civil Aeronautics Board.

"(6) 6 percent in the case of a corporation engaged in the furnishing or sale of transportation by common carrier by water, subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission under part III of the Interstate Commerce Act, or subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Maritime Board under the Intercoastal Shipping Act, 1933.

"(d) For the purposes of this subchapter the term 'regulated public utility' means (except as provided in subsection (e)) a corporation described in subsection (c), but only if 80 percent or more of its gross income (computed without regard to dividends and capital gains and losses) for the taxable year is derived from sources described in subsection (c). If the taxpayer establishes to the satisfaction of the Secretary that—

"(1) its revenue from regulated rates described in subsection (c) (1) or (4) and its revenue derived from unregulated rates are derived from its operation of a single interconnected and coordinated system within a single area or region in one or more States or from the operation of more than one such system, and

"(2) the regulation to which the taxpayer is subject in part of its operating territory of such a system is effective to control rates within the unregulated territory of such system so that rates within the unregulated territory have been and are substantially as favorable to users and consumers as are the rates within the regulated territory, such revenue from such unregulated rates shall be considered, for the purposes of this subsection, as income derived from sources described in subsection (c) (1) or (4).

"(e) Consolidated returns of regulated public utilities: For provisions applicable to consolidated returns of regulated public utilities computing their excess-profits credit under this section, see subsections (e) and (j) of section 141. For purposes of filing a consolidated return, a common parent corporation shall be deemed a regulated public utility if at least 90 percent of its gross income (computed without regard to capital gains or losses) is derived directly or indirectly from sources described in subsection (c). For the purposes of the preceding sentence dividends received from a regulated public utility shall be considered as derived from sources described in subsection (c) if the regulated public utility is a member of an affiliated group (as defined in section 141 (d)) which includes the common parent corporation."

"(2) Invested capital credit: The adjusted invested capital determined under section 437 (b) (2), or the historical invested capital determined under section 458, for any taxable year shall be increased by the amount by which (A) the taxpayer's deposits, as of the beginning of such taxable year, which are entitled to the benefits of section 511 or 607 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, exceeds (B) the additional taxes that would have been imposed under this chapter and chapter 2 in respect of such deposits for prior taxable years but for such sections 511 and 607. The increase in the invested capital credit for any taxable year resulting from the application of this paragraph shall be reduced by the amount of the taxpayer's deposits during such taxable year which are entitled to the benefits of such section 511 or 607, but such increase shall in no case be reduced below zero."

"SEC. 458. Historical invested capital.

"(a) Definition of historical invested capital: For the purposes of this subchapter the historical invested capital for any taxable year shall be the average invested capital for such year, determined under subsection (b). (For computation of invested capital in case of foreign corporations and corporations entitled to the benefits of section 251, see section 436 (b).)

"(b) Average invested capital: The average invested capital for any taxable year shall be the aggregate of the daily invested capital for each day of such taxable year, divided by the number of days in such taxable year.

"(c) Daily invested capital: The daily invested capital for any day of the taxable year shall be the sum of the equity invested capital for such day plus the daily borrowed capital for such day determined under section 439 (b).

"(d) Equity invested capital: The equity invested capital for any day of any taxable year shall be determined as of the beginning of such day and shall be the sum of the following amounts, reduced as provided in subsection (e)—

"(1) Money paid in: Money previously paid in for stock, or as paid-in surplus, or as a contribution to capital;

"(2) Property paid in: Property (other than money) previously paid in (regardless of the time paid in) for stock, or as paid-in surplus, or as a contribution to capital. Such property shall be included in an amount equal to its basis (unadjusted) for determining loss upon sale or exchange. If the property was disposed of before such taxable year, such basis shall be determined under the law applicable to the year of disposition, but without regard to the value of the property as of March 1, 1913. If the property was disposed of before March 1, 1913, its basis shall be considered to be its fair market value at the time paid in. If the unadjusted basis of the property is a substituted basis, such basis shall be adjusted, with respect to the period before the property was paid in, by an amount equal to the adjustments proper under section 115 (l) for determining earnings and profits. For the purposes of this section the fair value of additions and betterments made by the lessee to the physical properties of a lessor railroad corporation which have become the property of the lessor corporation by rejection of its lease (and fair value being determined as of the date such additions and betterments became the property of the lessor) shall be considered as a contribution to capital; and where the value of such improvements cannot be accurately determined by the old records thereof, because lost, incomplete, or inaccurate, the value of such improvements determined by the Interstate Commerce Commission for rate-making purposes shall be used in lieu of such fair value.

"(3) Distributions in stock: Distributions in stock—

"(A) Made prior to such taxable year to the extent to which they are considered distributions of earnings and profits; and

"(B) Previously made during such taxable year to the extent to which they are considered distributions of earnings and profits other than earnings and profits of such taxable year;

"(4) Earnings and profits at beginning of year: The accumulated earnings and profits as of the beginning of such taxable year;

"(5) Deficit in earnings and profits of another corporation: In the case of a transferee, as defined in subsection (f) (4), an amount, determined under such paragraph, equal to the portion of the deficit in earnings and profits of a transferor attributable to property received previously to such day.

"(e) Reduction in equity invested capital: The amount by which the equity invested capital for any day shall be reduced as provided in subsection (d) shall be the sum of the following amounts—

"(1) Distributions in previous years: Distributions made prior to such taxable year which were not out of accumulated earnings and profits;

"(2) Distribution during the year: Distributions previously made during such taxable year which are not out of the earnings and profits of such taxable year;

"(3) Earnings and profits of another corporation: The earnings and profits of another corporation which previously at any time were included in accumulated earnings and profits by reason of a transaction described in section 112 (b) to (e), both inclusive, or in the corresponding provision of a prior revenue law, or by reason of the transfer by such other corporation to the taxpayer of property the basis of which in the hands of the taxpayer is or was determined with reference to its basis in the hands of such other corporation, or would have been so determined if the property had been other than money; and

"(4) Deficit in earnings and profits transferred to another corporation: In the case of a transferor, as defined in subsection (f) (4), an amount, determined under such paragraph, equal to the portion of the deficit in earnings and profits of the transferor attributable to property transferred previously to such day.

"(f) Rules for Application of Subsections (d) and (e).—

"(1) Distributions to shareholders: The term 'distribution' means a distribution by a corporation to its shareholders, and the term 'distribution in stock' means a distribution by a corporation in its stock or rights to acquire its stock. To the extent that a distribution in stock is not considered a distribution of earnings and profits it shall not be considered a distribution. A distribution in stock shall not be regarded as money or property paid in for stock, or as paid-in surplus, or as a contribution to capital.

"(2) Distributions in first 60 days of taxable year: In the application of such subsections so much of the distributions (taken in the order of time) made during the first 60 days thereof as does not exceed the accumulated earnings and profits as of the beginning thereof (computed without regard to this paragraph) shall be considered to have been made on the last day of the preceding taxable year. This paragraph shall not apply with respect to distributions made during the first 60 days of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter.

"(3) Computation of earnings and profits of taxable year: For the purposes of subsections (d) (3) (B) and (e) (2) in determining whether a distribution is out of the earnings and profits of any taxable year, such earnings and profits shall be computed as of the close of such taxable year without diminution by reason of any distribution made during such taxable year or by reason of the tax under this subchapter or chapter 1 for such year and the determination shall be made without regard to the amount of earnings and profits at the time the distribution was made.

"(4) Deficit in earnings and profits—earnings and profits of transferor and transferee: If a corporation (hereinafter called 'transferor') transfers substantially all its property to another corporation formed to acquire such property (hereinafter called 'transferee'), if—

"(A) the sole consideration for the transfer of such property is the transfer to the transferor or its shareholders of all the stock of all classes (except qualifying shares) of the transferee. (In determining whether the transfer is solely for stock, the assumption by the transferee of a liability of the transferor or the fact that the property acquired is subject to a liability shall be disregarded);

"(B) the basis of the property, in the hands of the transferee, for the purposes of this subsection, is determined by reference to the basis of the property in the hands of the transferor;

"(C) the transferor is forthwith completely liquidated in pursuance of the plan under which the acquisition of the property is made; and

"(D) immediately after the liquidation the shareholders of the transferor own all such stock; for the purposes of this subchapter, in computing the equity invested capital for any day after the date of the acquisition of the property, the earnings and profits or deficit in earnings and profits of the transferee and the transferor shall be computed as if, immediately before the beginning of the taxable year in which such transfer occurs, the transferee had been in existence and sustained a recognized loss, and the transferor had realized a recognized gain, equal to the portion of the deficit in earnings and profits of the transferor attributable to such property.

"(g) For special rules affecting computation of property paid in for stock in connection with certain exchanges and liquidations, see part III.

"(h) The reserves of an insurance company shall not be included in computing equity invested capital under this section but shall be treated as daily borrowed capital as provided in section 439."

"PART II—EXCESS PROFITS CREDIT BASED ON INCOME IN CONNECTION WITH CERTAIN EXCHANGES

"SEC. 461. Definitions.

"For the purposes of this part—

"(a) Acquiring corporation. The term 'acquiring corporation' means—

"(1) A corporation which has acquired—

"(A) substantially all the properties of another corporation and the whole or a part of the consideration for the transfer of such properties is the transfer to such other corporation of all the stock of all classes (except qualifying shares) of the corporation which has acquired such properties, or

"(B) substantially all the properties of another corporation and the sole consideration for the transfer of such properties is the transfer to such other corporation of voting stock of the corporation which has acquired such properties, or

"(C) before December 1, 1950, properties of another corporation solely as paid-in surplus or a contribution to capital in respect of voting stock owned by such other corporation, or

"(D) substantially all the properties of a partnership in an exchange to which section 112 (b) (5), or so much of section 112 (c) or (e) as refers to section 112 (b) (5), or to which a corresponding provision of a prior revenue law, is or was applicable.

"(E) properties either from one or more corporations or from one or more partnerships or from one or more corporations and one or more partnerships in an exchange, not otherwise described in this subsection, to which section 112 (b) (5), or so much of section 112 (c) or (e) as refers to section 112 (b) (5), or to which a corresponding provision of a prior revenue law, is or was applicable.

For the purpose of subparagraphs (B) and (C) in determining whether such voting stock or such paid-in surplus or contribution to capital is the sole consideration, the assumption by the acquiring corporation of a liability of the other, or the fact that property acquired is subject to a liability, shall be disregarded. Subparagraph (B) or (C) shall apply only if the corporation transferring such properties is forthwith completely liquidated in pursuance of the plan under which the acquisition is made, and the transaction of which the acquisition is a part has the effect of a statutory merger or consolidation.

"(2) A corporation which has acquired property from another corporation in a transaction with respect to which gain or loss was not recognized under section 112 (b) (6) of chapter 1 or a corresponding provision of a prior revenue law;

"(3) A corporation the result of a statutory merger of two or more corporations; or

"(4) A corporation the result of a statutory consolidation of two or more corporations.

"(b) Component corporation: The term 'component corporation' means—

"(1) In the case of a transaction described in subsection (a) (1), the corporation which transferred the assets;

"(2) In the case of a transaction described in subsection (a) (2), the corporation the property of which was acquired;

"(3) In the case of a statutory merger, all corporations merged, except the corporation resulting from the merger; or

"(4) In the case of a statutory consolidation, all corporations consolidated, except the corporation resulting from the consolidation; or

"(5) In the case of a transaction specified in subsection (a) (1) (D), the partnership whose properties were acquired.

"(6) In the case of a tranaction specified in subsection (a) (1) (E), the partnership or corporations whose properties were acquired.

"(c) Income of certain component corporations not included: For the purposes of section 434, section 462, section 463, and section 464 in the case of a corporation which is a component corporation in a transaction described in subsection (a)—

"(1) Except as provided in paragraphs (2), (3) and (4), for the purpose of computing, for any taxable year ending after June 30, 1950, the excess profits credit of such component corporation or of an acquiring corporation of which the acquiring corporation in such transactions is not a component, no account shall be taken of the excess profits net income, or of the average base period net income if computed under section 444 (relating to new corporations), of such component corporation for any period before the day after such transaction, or of the excess profits net income, or of the average base period net income if computed under section 444 (relating to new corporations), for any period before the day after such transaction of its component corporations in any transaction before such transaction, and no account shall be taken of the capital reduction of such component corporation either immediately before such transaction or for any prior period, or of the capital addition or capital reduction either immediately before such transaction or for any prior period of its component corporations in any transaction before such transaction.

"(2) Except as provided in paragraphs (3) and (4), in case such transaction occurred in a taxable year of such component corporation ending after June 30, 1950, for the purpose of computing the excess profits credit of such component corporation for such taxable year, the amount of its average base period net income shall be limited to an amount which bears the same ratio to such average base period net income (computed without regard to this paragraph but with the application of paragraph (1) in case of a prior transaction described in subsection (a) with respect to such component corporation or a component corporation thereof), as the number of days in such taxable year before the day after such transaction bears to the total number of days in such taxable year.

"(3) Except as provided in paragraph (4), in the case of a transaction described in subsection (a) (1) (E), for the purpose of computing the excess profits credit of such component corporation or of an acquiring corporation of which the acquiring corporation in such transaction is not a component, no account shall be taken of that portion of the excess profits net income, or of the average base period net income if computed under section 444, of such component corporation, or of its component corporation in any transaction before such transaction, for any period before the day after such transaction which is allocable to the acquiring corporation in such transaction under section 462 (c), and no account shall be taken of that portion of the capital addition or capital reduction of such component corporation or of its component corporation in any transaction before such transaction either immediately before such transaction or for any prior period which is allocable to the acquiring corporation in such transaction under section 462 (e);

"(4) In the case of a transaction described in subsection (a) (1) (E) which occurred in a taxable year of such component corporation ending after June 30, 1950, for the purpose of computing the excess profits credit of such component corporation for such taxable year, the amount of its average base period net income shall be limited to the sum of the following:

"(A) An amount which bears the same ratio to such average base period net income (computed without regard to this paragraph but with the application of paragraphs (1) and (3) in case of a prior transaction described in subsection (a) with respect to such component corporation or a component corporation thereof), as the number of days in such taxable year before the day after such transaction bears to the total number of days in such taxable year; and

"(B) An amount which bears the same ratio to that portion of its average base period net income as is allocable to such component corporation in such transaction under section 462 (e) (computed without regard to this paragraph but with the application of paragraphs (1) and (3) in case of a prior transaction described in subsection (a) with respect to such component corporation or a component corporation thereof), as the number of days in such taxable year after the day of such transaction bears to the total number of days in such taxable year.

For the purposes of section 462, in the case of a corporation which is a component corporation in a transaction described in subsection (a), in computing for any taxable year the average base period net income of the acquiring corporation in such transaction or of a corporation of which such acquiring corporation becomes a component corporation, no account shall be taken of the excess profits net income of such component corporation for any period beginning with the day after such transaction.

"(d) For the purposes of sections 443 and 444 (relating to new corporations), any taxpayer which is an acquiring corporation shall be considered to have been in existence for any period during which it or any of its component corporations was in existence. Except for purposes of the previous sentence, a component corporation in transaction described in subsection (a) other than one described in subsection (a) (1) (E) shall be deemed not to have been in existence prior to the day after such transaction for purposes of determining the applicability of section 444 (relating to new corporations).

"(e) Component corporations of component corporations: If a corporation is a component corporation of an acquiring corporation, under subsection (b) or under this subsection, it shall (except for the purposes of section 462 (d) (1) and (2) and section 463 (a) (1), and (3)) also be a component corporation of the corporation of which such acquiring corporation is a component corporation.

"(f) Sole proprietorship: For the purposes of section 461 (a) (I) (D), 461 (b) (5), and 462 (g), a business owned by a sole proprietorship shall be considered a partnership."

On page 193, after line 6, to strike out:

"SEC. 462. Recomputation of excess profits net income.

"(a) In general: In the case of a taxpayer which is an acquiring corporation, its average base period net income (for the purpose of the credit computed under section 435) shall be the amount computed under section 435 without reference to this section or the amount under section 435 after the recomputation of its excess profits net income in the manner provided in this section, whichever is the greater. The excess profits net income under section 435 (d) (1) of such acquiring corporation recomputed with the application of this section shall be the excess profits net income for each month of the acquiring corporation's base period increased or decreased, as the case may be, by the addition or reduction resulting from including the excess profits net income for that month of all component corporations in the manner provided in subsection (b).

"(b) Method of recomputation of excess profits net income of acquiring corporation.—

"(1) The excess profits net income for each month in the base period of the acquiring corporation shall be determined in the case of the acquiring corporation, and of any component corporation, as provided in section 435 (d) (1) without regard, however, to that part of such section which provides that in no event shall the excess profits net income of any corporation for any month be less than zero.

"(2) For the purposes of this section, if, for any full month of the acquiring corporation's base period during which such corporation was in existence as provided in section 461 (d), either the acquiring corporation or any component corporation was not in existence, such corporation's excess profits net income for such month shall, notwithstanding the last sentence of section 435 (d) (1), be an amount equal to 1 per centum of the excess of

"(A) the equity capital (as defined in section 437 (c)) of such corporation at the close of the day before the transaction described in section 461 (a) occurred, or at the close of the base period of such corporation, whichever is earlier, over

"(B) an amount equal to the same percentage of such equity capital as would be applicable under section 440 in reduction of the excess-profits credit (based on invested capital) of such corporation if section 440 were applied on the day before the transaction described in section 461 (a) occurred, or at the close of the base period of such corporation, whichever is earlier.

In case either the acquiring corporation or any component corporation owned stock in any other such corporation on the first day of such owning corporation's first taxable year under this subchapter, the amounts computed under subparagraphs (A) and (B) with respect to such corporations shall be adjusted, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, to such extent as may be necessary to prevent the excess profits net income of such corporations for the base period of the acquiring corporation from reflecting money or property having been paid in by either of such corporations to the other for stock or as paid-in surplus or as a contribution to capital, or from reflecting stock of either having been paid in for stock of the other or as paid-in surplus or as a contribution to capital. For the purposes of this paragraph, stock in either such corporation which has in the hands of the other corporation a basis determined with reference to the basis of stock previously acquired by the issuance of such other corporation's own stock shall be deemed to have been paid in for the stock of such other corporation.

"(3) For every month of the acquiring corporation's base period there shall be added to the excess profits net income or deficit in excess profits net income of the acquiring corporation for that month the excess profits net income or deficit in excess profits net income of each component corporation for that month. The excess profits net income of the acquiring corporation for any month, recomputed as provided in the previous sentence, shall, in no event, be less than zero.

"(c) Use by acquiring corporation of alternative average base period net income based on growth provided for in section 435 (e).—

"(1) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a), other than a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), in which the acquiring corporation and all the component corporations were in existence (without regard to the provisions of section 461 (d)) and had commenced business more than 48 months before the close of the base period of the acquiring corporation, the acquiring corporation, for purposes of determining its qualification under section 435 (e) (1), shall combine with its total payroll and its total gross receipts, for any portion of such acquiring corporation's base period as preceded such transaction, the total payroll and total gross receipts of such component corporations for such period. The allocation of payroll and gross receipts amounts of a component corporation to such portion of such base period shall be made in accordance with the rules provided in section 435 (e) (4) and 435 (e) (5). For purposes of qualifying under section 435 (e) (1) (B) (relating to total assets of the taxpayer), such acquiring corporation shall combine its total assets on the date specified in section 435 (e) (1) (B) with the total assets of such component corporations on such date. In the event, however, that such transaction occurred during the base period of the acquiring corporation, section 435 (e) shall be inapplicable in determining the acquiring corporation's average base period net income where that determination is based upon the excess profits net income of the acquiring corporation computed under section 435 (d) (1) without reference to the recomputation provided for by this section.

"(2) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a), other than a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), in which either the acquiring corporation or one or more component corporations was in existence (without regard to the provisions of section 461 (d) and had commenced business more than 36 months before the close of the base period of the acquiring corporation and was entitled to the benefits of section 435 (c) prior to such transaction but in which either the acquiring corporation or one or more of such component corporations was not in existence (without regard to the provisions of section 461 (d)) or had not commenced business more than 48 months before the close of the base period of such acquiring corporation, if such transaction occurred during the base period of the acquiring corporation, section 435 (e) shall be inapplicable in determining the acquiring corporation's average base period net income based either upon its excess profits net income computed under section 435 (d) (1) without reference to this section or upon its excess profits net income recomputed under that section in the manner provided in this section. In any such case, if such transaction occurred after the close of the base period of such acquiring corporation, the monthly excess profits net income of the corporation entitled to the benefits of section 435 (e) for any month of the acquiring corporation's base period shall be, for purposes of the recomputation provided by this section, one-twelfth of the credit to which such corporation was entitled under section 435 (e).

"(3) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E) in which the component corporation was in existence and had commenced business more than 48 months before the close of the base period of the acquiring corporation, and, immediately prior to such transaction, was entitled to the benefits of section 435 (e), if such transaction occurred after the close of the base period of the component corporation, both the component corporation and the acquiring corporation shall be entitled to compute their average base period net income by the use of the method provided in section 435 (e) without reference to the tests prescribed under that section with respect to qualifying thereunder. If the transaction occurred during the base period of the acquiring corporation, the payroll and gross receipts of the component corporation for the period prior to the day of the transaction shall be allocated as between the component corporation and the acquiring corporation in the same ratio as the excess profits net income and the average base period net income computed under section 444 of the component corporation are allocated under subsection (e), and such allocated payroll and gross receipts amounts shall be treated by the component corporation and by the acquiring corporation as the payroll and gross receipts of the component corporation and the acquiring corporation for the period prior to the transaction. The acquiring corporation in such a case shall be considered, for purposes of section 435 (e), as having commenced business at the time the component corporation commenced business. In the application of the test prescribed in section 435 (e) (1) (B) (relating to total assets of the taxpayer) the component corporation and the acquiring corporation shall each be considered as having the total assets of the component corporation as of the date applicable for purposes of section 435 (e) (1) (B).

"(4) For the purpose of this subsection, in any case subject to the application of paragraphs (1) and (2), where, for purposes of section 435 (c), the gross receipts of a corporation are referred to in the determination of the average base period net income under that section, the Secretary shall prescribe by regulation such rules as may be necessary in order to insure that such gross receipts shall not be distorted by reason of transactions between companies which are parties to the transaction described in section 461 (a).

"(d) Use by acquiring corporation of alternative average base period net income provided for new corporation in section 444: An acquiring corporation in a transaction described in section 461 (a), other than a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), if it was not in existence (as determined under section 461 (d)) prior to January 1, 1946, shall be entitled to determine its average base period net income for purposes of section 444 in the manner provided in section 444 subject, however, to the following exceptions:

"(1) Where the transaction occurred after the close of the third taxable year of the acquiring corporation and of the component corporation or corporations, the average base period net income of the acquiring corporation after the transaction shall be determined, for purposes of section 444, in lieu of in the manner provided by section 444 (b), by adding the average base period net incomes of the acquiring corporation and of the component corporation or corporations as previously determined under that section at the close of the third taxable years of such corporations.

"(2) Where the transaction occurred prior to the close of the third taxable year of either the acquiring corporation (determined without regard to section 461 (d)) or of one or more of the component corporations, but after the close of the third taxable year of one or more of such corporations, the average base period net income of the acquiring corporation for purposes of section 444 shall be determined, in lieu of in the manner provided by subsection (b), by adding the average base period net incomes previously determined under section 444 at the close of the third taxable year of the corporations in existence for more than three taxable years and an average base period net income amount computed by the method specified in section 444 for each corporation not in existence for three taxable years by applying the industry rate of return for such corporation to the total assets of such corporation immediately prior to such transaction.

An acquiring corporation in a transaction referred to in section 461 (a) (1) (E) shall not be entitled to determine its average base period net earnings by reference to section 444 except to the extent that it is entitled to an allocable portion of the average base period net income of a component corporation so computed and allocated to the acquiring corporation in the manner prescribed by subsection (e) of this section.

"(e) Allocation rule: In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), the amount of the component corporation's excess-profits net income for any month which shall be taken into account by the acquiring corporation in the recomputation of its excess-profits net income as provided in subsection (b) shall be such portion of the component corporation's total excess-profits net income for that month as the fair market value of the assets transferred by the component corporation to the acquiring corporation bears to the fair market value of the total assets of the component corporation as they existed at the close of the day before the transaction. In any such case, that amount of the average base period net income, if computed under section 444 (relating to new corporations), of the component corporation which is allocable to the acquiring corporation shall be such portion of the component corporation's total average base period net income computed under that section as the fair market value of the assets transferred by the component corporation to the acquiring corporation bears to the fair market value of the total assets of the component corporation as they existed at the close of the day before the transaction. Pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary, in lieu of the amount of the component corporation's excess-profits net income for any month, or of the component corporation's average base-period net income computed under section 444, referred to above and determined as prescribed above, there may be included an amount agreed upon by the acquiring corporation and the component corporation and any other corporation a party to such transaction, provided the Secretary consents thereto. In no case shall the total of the excess-profits net incomes, or the total of the average base period net incomes computed under section 444, provided for in such agreement be in excess of 100 percent of the excess profits net income, or of the average base-period net income computed under section 444, of the component corporation. In any case in which an agreement between the parties and consent thereto by the Secretary is not obtained, a final determination of the fair market values of the properties for the purposes of this subsection shall be binding upon all parties claiming a right to the credit of the component corporation.

"(f) (1) If, after December 31, 1945—

"(A) the taxpayer acquired stock in another corporation, and thereafter such other corporation became a component corporation of the taxpayer, or

"(B) a corporation (hereinafter called 'first corporation') acquired stock in another corporation (hereinafter called 'second corporation'), and thereafter the first and second corporations became component corporations of the taxpayer, then to the extent that the consideration for such acquisition was not the issuance of the taxapayer's or first corporation's, as the case may be, own stock, the average base-period net income of the taxpayer shall be reduced, and the transferred capital addition and reduction adjusted in respect of the income and capital addition and reduction of the corporation whose stock was so acquired and in respect of the income and capital addition and reduction of any other corporation which at the time of such acquisition was connected directly or indirectly through stock ownership with the corporation whose stock was so acquired and which thereafter became a component corporation of the taxpayer, in such amounts and in such manner as shall be determined in acordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary. For the purposes of this paragraph, stock which has, in the hands of the taxpayer or first corporation, as the case may be, a basis determined with reference to the basis of stock previously acquired by the issuance of the taxpayer's or first corporation's, as the case may be, own stock, shall be considered as having been acquired in consideration of the issuance of the taxpayer's or first corporation's, as the case may be, own stock.

"(2) If during the taxable year for which tax is computed under this subchapter the taxpayer acquires assets in a transaction which constitutes it an acquiring corporation, the amount includible under subsection (a), attributable to such transaction, shall be limited to an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount computed without regard to this subsection as the number of days in the taxable year after such transaction bears to the total number of days in such taxable year.

"(g) In the case of a partnership which is a component corporation by virtue of section 461 (b) (5) and (6), the computations required by this part shall be made, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary, as if such partnership had been a corporation.

"(h) In the case of a taxpayer which becomes an acquiring corporation in any taxable year ending after June 30, 1950, if, at the beginning of the first taxable year of such corporation which ends after June 30, 1950, and at all times until the taxpayer became an acquiring corporation—

"(1) the taxpayer owned not less than 75 percent of each class of stock of each of the qualified component corporations involved in the transaction in which the taxpayer became an acquiring corporation; or

"(2) one of the qualified component corporations involved in the transaction owned not less than 75 percent of each class of stock of the taxpayer, and of each of the other qualified component corporations involved in the transaction,

the average base period net income of the taxpayer shall not be less than (A) the average base period net income of that one of its qualified component corporations involved in the transaction the average base period net income of which is greatest, or (B) the average base period net income of the taxpayer computed without regard to the base period net income of any of its qualified component corporations involved in the transaction. As used in this subsection, the term 'qualified component corporation' means a component corporation which was in existence on the date of the beginning of the taxpayer's base period."

"SEC. 463. Capital changes.

"(a) Taxpayer using part II of this subchapter: For the purposes of section 435 (g), if the transaction which constitutes the taxpayer an acquiring corporation occurs in a taxable year of the taxpayer which ends after June 30, 1950, and the taxpayer's average base period net income is computed under section 435 after the redetermination of its excess-profits net income in the manner provided in section 462, the following rules shall apply in computing the daily capital addition and daily capital reduction of the taxpayer for each day after such transaction:

"(1) The transferred capital addition or transferred capital reduction of the component corporation shall be treated as if it were a capital addition or reduction as the case may be, of the taxpayer.

"(2) The transferred capital addition of the component corporation shall be its daily capital addition as of the time immediately before the transaction (computed under section 435 (g), but without regard to the reduction of the amount ascertained under section 435 (g) (3) on account of inadmissible assets as defined in section 440, but with the application of paragraph (6) of this subsection).

"(3) The transferred capital reduction of the component corporation shall be its daily capital reduction as of the time immediately before the transaction (computed under section 435 (g), but without regard to the reduction of the amount ascertained under section 435 (g) (4) on account of inadmissible assets as defined in section 440, but with the application of paragraph (7) of this subsection).

"(4) In computing the daily capital addition of the taxpayer, money or property paid in to the taxpayer by any of its component corporations, and property consisting of stock in any such component corporation paid in by shareholders of such component corporation, shall be disregarded.

"(5) In computing the daily capital reduction of the taxpayer, distributions by the taxpayer to any of its component corporations not out of earnings and profits shall be disregarded.

"(6) In computing the transferred capital addition of the component corporation, money or property paid in to such component corporation by the taxpayer or any other component corporation and property consisting of stock in the taxpayer or any other component corporation paid in by shareholders of the taxpayer or other component corporation, shall be disregarded.

"(7) In computing the transferred capital reduction of the component corporation, distributions by such component corporation to the taxpayer or any other component corporation shall be disregarded.

"(8) The daily capital addition and daily capital reduction of the taxpayer to which any amount is added under paragraph (1) shall be the amount thereof computed before its reduction under section 435 (g) (3) or (4), as the case may be, on account of inadmissible assets as defined in section 440.

"(b) Rule where acquiring corporation is component of taxpayer: In cases where an acquiring corporation is a component of the taxpayer, and the transaction which constitutes such corporation an acquiring corporation occurs in a taxable year of such corporation which ends after June 30, 1950, for the purpose of determining the daily capital addition or reduction of the taxpayer the above rules shall be applied in a similar manner to determine the daily capital addition or reduction of such acquiring corporation for each day after such transaction."

"SEC. 461. Definitions.

"For the purposes of this part—

"(a) Acquiring corporation: The term 'acquiring corporation' means—

"(1) A corporation which has acquired—

"(A) substantially all the properties of another corporation and the whole or a part of the consideration for the transfer of such properties is the transfer to such other corporation of all the stock of all classes (except qualifying shares) of the corporation which has acquired such properties, or

"(B) substantially all the properties of another corporation and the sole consideration for the transfer of such properties is the transfer to such other corporation of voting stock of the corporation which has acquired such properties, or

"(C) before December 1, 1950, properties of another corporation solely as paid-in surplus or a contribution to capital in respect of voting stock owned by such other corporation, or

"(D) substantially all the properties of a partnership in an exchange to which section 112 (b) (5), or so much of section 112 (c) or (e) as refers to section 112 (b) (5) is applicable.

"(E) properties either from one or more corporations or from one or more partnerships or from one or more corporations and one or more partnerships, other than from a corporation exempt under section 101, in an exchange, not otherwise described in this subsection, to which section 112 (b) (4) or (5), or so much of section 112 (c) or (e) as refers to section 112 (b) (4) or (5), is applicable.

For the purpose of subparagraphs (B) and (C) in determining whether such voting stock or such paid-in surplus or contribution to capital is the sole consideration, the assumption by the acquiring corporation of a liability of the other, or the fact that property acquired is subject to a liability, shall be disregarded. Subparagraph (C) shall apply only if the corporation transferring such properties is forthwith completely liquidated in pursuance of the plan under which the acquisition is made, and the transaction of which the acquisition is a part has the effect of a statutory merger or consolidation.

"(2) A corporation which has acquired property from another corporation in a transaction with respect to which gain or loss was not recognized under section 112 (b) (6);

"(3) A corporation the result of a statutory merger of two or more corporations; or

"(4) A corporation the result of a statutory consolidation of two or more corporations.

"(b) Component corporation: The term 'component corporation' means—

"(1) In the case of a transaction described in subsection (a) (1), the corporation which transferred the assets;

"(2) In the case of a transaction described in subsection (a) (2), the corporation the property of which was acquired;

"(3) In the case of a statutory merger, all corporations merged, except the corporation resulting from the merger; or

"(4) In the case of a statutory consolidation, all corporations consolidated, except the corporation resulting from the consolidation; or

"(5) In the case of a transaction specified in subsection (a) (1) (D), the partnership whose properties were acquired;

"(6) In the case of a transaction specified in subsection (a) (1) (E), the partnerships or corporations whose properties were acquired.

"(c) Income of certain component corporations not included: For the purposes of section 434, section 462, section 463, and section 464, in the case of a corporation which is a component corporation in a transaction described in subsection (a)—

"(1) Except as provided in paragraphs (2), (3), and (4), for the purpose of computing, for any taxable year ending after June 30, 1950, the excess profits credit of such component corporation or of an acquiring corporation of which the acquiring corporation in such transaction is not a component, no account shall be taken of the excess profits net income, or of the average base period net income if computed under section 442, 443, 444, 445, or 446, of such component corporation for any period before the day after such transaction, and no account shall be taken of capital additions in the base period computed under section 435 (f), and net capital additions or reductions computed under section 435 (g), of such component corporation to the extent that such computations relate to any period before such transaction.

"(2) Except as provided in paragraphs (3) and (4), in case such transaction occurred in a taxable year of such component corporation ending after June 30, 1950, for the purpose of computing the excess profits credit of such component corporation for such taxable year, the amount of its average base period net income shall be limited to an amount which bears the same ratio to such average base period net income (computed without regard to this paragraph) as the number of days in such taxable year before the day after such transaction bears to the total number of days in such taxable year.

"(3) Except as provided in paragraph (4), in the case of a transaction described in subsection (a) (1) (E), for the purpose of computing the excess profits credit of such component corporation or of an acquiring corporation of which the acquiring corporation in such transaction is not a component, no account shall be taken of that portion of the excess profits net income, or of the average base period net income if computed under section 442, 443, 444, 445, or 446, of such component corporation, for any period before the day after such transaction which is allocable to the acquiring corporation in such transaction under section 462 (1), and no account shall be taken of that portion of capital additions in the base period computed under section 435 (f), and net capital additions or reductions computed under section 435 (g), of such component corporation, to the extent that such computations relate to any period before such transaction, which is allocable to the acquiring corporation in such transaction under section 462 (1);

"(4) In the case of a transaction described in subsection (a) (1) (E) which occurred in a taxable year of such component corporation ending after June 30, 1950, for the purpose of computing the excess profits credit of such component corporation for such taxable year, the amount of its average base period net income shall be limited to the sum of the following:

"(A) An amount which bears the same ratio to such average base-period net income (computed without regard to this paragraph), as the number of days in such taxable year before the day after such transaction bears to the total number of days in such taxable year; and

"(B) An amount which bears the same ratio to that portion of its average base-period net income as is allocable to such component corporation in such transaction under section 462 (i) (computed without regard to this paragraph), as the number of days in such taxable year after the day of such transaction bears to the total number of days in such taxable year.

For the purposes of section 462, in the case of a corporation which is a component corporation in a transaction described in subsection (a), in computing for any taxable year the average base-period net income of the acquiring corporation in such transaction, no account shall be taken of the excess-profits net income, or of the average base-period net income, of such component corporation for any period beginning with the day after such transaction.

"(d) For purposes of sections 435 (e), 442, 443, 444, 445, and 446, any taxpayer which is an acquiring corporation shall be considered to have been in existence and to have had taxable years for any period during which it or any of its component corporations was in existence, and such corporation shall be considered to have commenced business on the earliest date on which it or any of its component corporations commenced business. Except for purposes of the previous sentence, a component corporation in a transaction described in subsection (a), other than one described in subsection (a) (1) (E), shall be deemed not to have been in existence or to have commenced business prior to the day after such transaction for purposes of determining the applicability of sections 435 (e), 442, 443, 444, 445, and 446, to such corporation after such transaction. For purposes of the first sentence of this subsection, a corporation which was an acquiring corporation in a previous transaction shall be deemed to have been in existence for such period as is determined by the application of that sentence to that corporation with respect to that transaction. For purposes of his part, where sections 443 (b), 444 (c), 445 (b), and 446 (b) refer to the amount of a taxpayer's total assets as of the last day of its taxable year immediately preceding the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter, such references, where appropriate, shall be taken to mean the amount of such taxpayer's total assets as of the last day of its base period.

"(e) Component corporation which was an acquiring corporation in a previous transaction: In the case of a component corporation which was an acquiring corporation in a previous transaction, its average base-period net income, for purposes of the later transaction, shall be determined under sections 435 (d), 435 (e), or 442 (c) with the application of section 462 (b), and of sections 462 (c) or (d), where applicable, with respect to the previous transaction, and its average base-period net income, for purposes of the later transaction, shall be determined under sections 442 (d), 443, 444, 445, or 446, with the application of sections 462 (d), (e), (f), (g), or (h), where applicable, with respect to the previous transaction.

"(f) Sole proprietorship: For the purposes of sections 461 (a) (1) (D), 461 (b) (5), and 462 (k), a business owned by a sole proprietorship shall be considered a partnership."

"SEC. 462. Average base period net income—Determination

"(a) In general: In the case of a taxpayer which is an acquiring corporation, for the purposes of the determination of its average base period net income under section 435 (c), its average base period net income determined under section 435 (d) may be determined by computing its excess profits net income either with or without reference to section 462 (b), and its average base period net income under sections 435 (e) or 442 (c), subject to the rules provided in sections 462 (c) or (d), may likewise be determined by computing its excess profits net income either with or without reference to section 462 (b). Its average base period net income under sections 442 (d), 443, 444, 445, and 446 shall be determined subject to the rules provided in sections 462 (d), (e), (f), (g), and (h). The excess profits net income of such acquiring corporation, computed with reference to section 462 (b), shall be the excess profits net income for each month of the acquiring corporation's base period, and for the additional period ending June 30, 1950, increased or decreased, as the case may be, by the addition or reduction resulting from including the excess profits net income for that month of all component corporations in the manner provided in subsection (b).

"(b) Method of recomputation of excess profits net income of acquiring corporation.—

"(1) The excess profits net income for each month in the base period of the acquiring corporation and for each month in the additional period ending June 30, 1950, shall be determined in the case of the acquiring corporation, and of any component corporation, as provided in section 435 (d) (1) without regard, however, to that part of such section which provides that in no event shall the excess profits net income of any corporation for any month be less than zero.

"(2) For the purposes of this section, if the acquiring corporation was in existence, as provided in section 461 (d), at the beginning of its base period and, for any full month of such base period, either the acquiring corporation or any component corporation was not in existence, such corporation's excess profits net income for such month shall, notwithstanding the last sentence of section 435 (d) (1), be an amount equal to 1 percent of the equity capital (as defined in section 437 (c)) of such corporation at the close of the day before the transaction described in section 461 (a) occurred, or at the close of the base period of such corporation, whichever is earlier, reduced by an amount determined under section 440 (b) (relating to ratio of inadmissible assets), by applying section 440 (b) as of the day before the transaction described in section 461 (a) occurred, or at the close of the base period of such corporation, whichever is earlier. In case either the acquiring corporation or any component corporation owned stock in any other such corporation on the first day of such owning corporation's first taxable year under this subchapter, the amounts computed under this paragraph with respect to such corporations shall be adjusted, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary, to such extent as may be necessary to prevent the excess profits net income of such corporations for the base period of the acquiring corporation from reflecting money or property having been paid in by either of such corporations to the other for stock or as paid-in surplus or as a contribution to capital, or from reflecting stock of either having been paid in for stock of the other or as paid-in surplus or as a contribution to capital. For the purposes of this paragraph, stock in either such corporation which has in the hands of the other corporation a basis determined with reference to the basis of stock previously acquired by the issuance of such other corporation's own stock shall be deemed to have been paid in for the stock of such other corporation.

"(3) For every month of the acquiring corporation's base period and for each month thereafter for the period ending June 30, 1950, there shall be added to the excess profits net income of the acquiring corporation for that month, as determined under paragraphs (1) and (2), the excess profits net income of each component corporation for that month so determined. The excess profits net income of the acquiring corporation for any month, recomputed as provided in the previous sentence, shall, in no event, be less than zero.

"(c) Use by acquiring corporation of alternative average base period net income based on growth provided for in section 435 (e):

"(1) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a), other than a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E),

"(A) where, immediately prior to the date of the transaction, the acquiring corporation and all the component corporations (other than a corporation created incident to such transaction) met the requirements of sections 435 (e) (1) (A) and (B):

"(i) the acquiring corporation shall not be denied the right to determine whether it is eligible for the benefits of section 435 (e) without reference to the recomputation of its excess profits net income provided for in section 462 (b) where the transaction occurred on or after July 1, 1950, but it shall be denied such right where the transaction occurred prior to July 1, 1950, and

"(ii) the acquiring corporation shall be entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 435 (e) with reference to the recomputation of its excess profits net income provided for in section 462 (b) if the tests of section 435 (e) are satisfied. For that purpose, the acquiring corporation shall combine with its total payroll and its total gross receipts for that portion of its base period which preceded such transaction the total payroll and total gross receipts of such component corporations for that portion of such period. The allocation of payroll and gross receipts amounts of a component corporation to any such portion of such period shall be made in accordance with the rules provided in section 435 (e) (4) and (5). For purposes of qualifying under section 435 (e) (1) (B) (relating to total assets of the taxpayer), such acquiring corporation shall combine its total assets on the date specified in section 435 (e) (1) (B) with the total assets of each component corporation on such date. The Secretary shall prescribe by regulation such rules as may be necessary to insure that such combined total gross receipts do not reflect a duplication for purposes of this section;

"(B) where, immediately prior to the date of the transaction, either the acquiring corporation or one or more component corporations, met the requirements of section 435 (e) (1) (A) and (B), but where either the acquiring corporation or one or more of such component corporations (other than a corporation created incident to such transaction) did not meet such requirements, the acquiring corporation shall not be entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 435 (e), regardless of the date on which the transaction occurred, or of whether or not, after the transaction, it determines its excess profits net income with reference to the recomputation provided for in section 462 (b). In any such case, where the transaction occurred on or after July 1, 1950, the monthly excess profits net income of the corporation entitled to the benefits of section 435 (e) for any month of the acquiring corporation's base period shall be, for purposes of the recomputation provided for in section 462 (b), one-twelfth of the average base period net income to which such corporation was entitled under section 435 (e).

"(2) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E) which occurred after the close of the base period of the component corporation in which the component corporation, immediately prior to the date of the transaction, was entitled to the use of the alternative average base period net income based on growth provided for in section 435 (e), the acquiring corporation, if it determines its excess-profits net income with reference to the recomputation provided for in section 462 (b), and the component corporation shall be entitled to compute their average base period net incomes under section 435 (e). Where the transaction occurred during the base period of the acquiring corporation, and the component corporation, immediately prior to the date of the transaction, met the requirements of sections 435 (e) (1) (A) and (B), the acquiring corporation, if it determines its excess-profits net income with reference to the recomputation provided for in section 462 (b), and the component corporation, shall be entitled to compute their average base period net incomes under section 435 (e), provided, however, that they met the tests of that section. For that purpose, the payroll and gross receipts of the component corporation for the period prior to the day of the transaction, determined in accordance with the rules provided in section 435 (e) (4) and (5), shall be allocated as between the component corporation and the acquiring corporation in the same ratio as the excess-profits net income of the component corporation allocated under subsection (i), and such allocated payroll and gross receipts amounts shall be treated by the component corporation and by the acquiring corporation as the payroll and gross receipts of the component corporation and the acquiring corporation for the period prior to the transaction. In the application of the test prescribed in section 435 (e) (1) (B) relating to total assets of the taxpayer) the component corporation and the acquiring corporation shall each be considered as having held the total assets of the component corporation as of the date applicable for purposes of section 435 (e) (1) (B).

"(d) Use by acquiring corporation of alternative average base period net income provided in the case of base period abnormalities in section 442.—

"(1) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) which occurred during the base period of an acquiring corporation which commenced business (as provided in section 461 (d)) prior to the beginning of its base period, the acquiring corporation shall be entitled to determine its average base period net income under section 442 (c) or (d) if it satisfies the requirements of either such subsection and satisfies the other requirements of section 442. For purposes of section 442—

"(A) In the case of such a transaction, other than a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), for purposes:

"(i) of determining excess-profits net income for any month of the base period for purposes of section 442 (c) or (d), such acquiring corporation shall recompute its monthly excess-profits net income as provided in section 462 (b), but without regard to the last sentence of section 462 (b) (3);

"(ii) of the computation provided in section 442 (d) (1) or (e) (1) (A) with respect to any day, the acquiring corporation shall be considered as having had the total assets of its component corporation or corporations on such day;

"(iii) of the interest adjustment provided in section 442 (d) (4) and (e) (1) (B), the acquiring corporation shall be considered as having paid or incurred the interest paid or incurred by its component corporation or corporations for that part of such periods as is referred to in those sections as preceded the date of the transaction; and

"(iv) of determining the existence of an abnormality under section 442 (a) with respect to the period prior to such transaction, the acquiring corporation shall be treated as if the component corporation's business during such period were its own; and

"(B) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), for purposes:

"(i) of determining excess profits net income for any month of the base period for purposes of section 442 (c) or (d), such acquiring corporation shall be considered as having had for that month that proportion of the excess profits net income (or deficit in excess profits net income) of the component corporation for such month which is allocable to such acquiring corporation under section 462 (i);

"(ii) of the computation referred to in subparagraph (A) (ii) of this paragraph and of the interest adjustment referred to in subparagraph (A) (iii) of this paragraph, the acquiring corporation shall be considered as having had the same portion of the items referred to in those subparagraphs as the ratio of its allocable share of the excess profits net income of the component corporation under section 462 (i) bears to the total excess profits net income of that corporation; and

"(iii) of determining the existence of an abnormality under section 442 (a) with respect to the period prior to such transaction, the acquiring corporation shall be treated as if that portion of the component corporation's business which was subsequently transferred to the acquiring corporation had been its own.

"(2) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) which occurred after the close of the base period of an acquiring corporation which commenced business (as provided in section 461 (d)) prior to the beginning of its base period, the acquiring corporation shall not be entitled to determine its average base period net income under section 442 except that:

"(A) if all of the corporations, parties to the transaction, were, prior to the transaction, entitled to compute their average base period net incomes under section 442 (d) or under sections 442 (d), 443, 444, 445, or 446, the acquiring corporation may add an average base period net income of any such corporation computed under section 442 (d) to such other average base period net incomes for the purpose of determining its average base period net income after the transaction under the section applicable to it prior to the transaction, and

"(B) if all of the corporations, parties to the transaction, were, prior to the transaction, entitled to compute their average base period net incomes under section 442 (c), if some were so entitled under section 442 (c) and the remainder under section 442 (d), or if some, but not all, were so entitled under either section 442 (c) or (d), then, for purposes of the recomputation of the excess profits net income of the acquiring corporation under section 462 (b), and for purposes of the allocation of a portion of the excess profits net income (or deficit in excess profits net income) of the component corporation to the acquiring corporation under section 462 (i) in the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E);

"(i) in the case of an average base period net income computed under section 442 (c), the substitute excess profits net income of the corporation for any month determined under section 442 (c) (1) shall be treated as the excess profits net income of that corporation for that month; and

"(ii) in the case of an average base period net income computed under section 442 (d), a figure obtained by dividing such average base period net income by 12 shall be treated as the excess profits net income of that corporation for any month of its base period.

"(3) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a), where the acquiring corporation had not commenced business, within the meaning of section 461 (d), prior to the beginning of its base period, the acquiring corporation shall not be entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 442 in the manner provided therein or as provided in this section.

"(e) Use by acquiring corporation of alternative average base period net income provided for change in products or services in section 443—

"(1) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a), other than a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), where the acquiring corporation had commenced business, within the meaning of section 461 (d), on or before the first day of its base period, the following rules shall be applicable in determining the availability to the acquiring corporation of a right to compute its average base period net income under section 443—

"(A) Except as provided in subparagraphs (B) and (D), where any corporation a party to the transaction, other than a corporation created incident to such transaction, had not commenced business, without regard to section 461 (d), on or before the first day of the acquiring corporation's base period, the acquiring corporation shall not be entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 443.

"(B) In a case described in subparagraph (A) above, where the acquiring corporation, other than a corporation created incident to such transaction, and all of the component corporations were, prior to the transaction, entitled to compute their average base period net incomes under section 442 (d), 443, 444, 445 or 446, the acquiring corporation may add an average base period net income computed under section 443 of any of the parties to the transaction to such other average base period net incomes for the purpose of determining its average base period net income after the transaction under the section applicable to it prior to the transaction.

"(C) Where, at the time of the transaction, one or more of the corporations, parties to the transaction, had made a substantial change, within the meaning of section 443 (a) (1), in the products or services which it furnished, but where such corporations were not entitled at such time to compute their average base period net incomes under section 443, the acquiring corporation, if it recomputes its excess profits net income in the manner provided in section 462 (b) (but without regard to the last sentence of section 462 (b) (3)), shall be entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 443 if the requirements of that section are satisfied. For that purpose the gross income of all of the component corporations for taxable years beginning with, within, and subsequent to, the taxable year of the corporation which made the first such change in which such change was made shall be treated as having been earned by the acquiring corporation. The total assets of the component corporations as they existed on the last day of such year of the acquiring corporation which preceded the taxable year in which the transaction occurred shall be treated, for purposes of the determination of its average base period net income under section 443 for the taxable year of the transaction and for subsequent taxable years, as having been held by the acquiring corporation on such day. Interest paid or incurred by any component corporation prior to the day of the transaction shall be considered as having been paid or incurred by the acquired corporation at the time when it was paid or incurred by such component corporation. In any such case, each such change shall be treated as having been made by the acquiring corporation at the time when it was made by the corporation making the change.

"(D) In a case described in subparagraph (A), where a corporation a party to the transaction commenced business during the 36-month period ending on the last day of the base period of the acquiring corporation, and the transaction occurred prior to December 1, 1950, the activities of that corporation shall be treated for purposes of section 443, and with respect to the activities of the other corporations parties to the transaction, as though they constituted a substantial change in products or services furnished, within the meaning of section 443 (a) (1), by the acquiring corporation and, for purposes of determining whether or not the acquiring corporation meets the requirements of that section, the rules prescribed in subparagraph (C) shall be applicable.

"(E) Where there was a substantial change in the products or services furnished by the acquiring corporation subsequent to the date of the transaction, the acquiring corporation shall be entitled to determine its average base period net income under section 443 with respect to such change if it recomputes its excess profits net income in the manner provided in section 462 (b) (without regard to the last sentence of section 462 (b) (3)), subject to the application of the rules prescribed in subparagraph (C).

"(F) Subject to the application of the above rules, an acquiring corporation shall not be deemed, for purposes of section 443, to have made a substantial change in the products or services furnished by it solely by reason of a change in such products or services resulting from the execution of a transaction described in section 461 (a).

"(2) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), the acquiring corporation shall only be entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 443 where:

"(A) the component corporation was entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 443 prior to the date of the transaction, in which event such average base period net income shall be allocated as between the acquiring corporation and the component corporation in the manner provided in section 462 (i), or

"(B) there was, after the date of the transaction, a substantial change in the products or services furnished by the acquiring corporation and the acquiring corporation determines its excess profits net income for each month of the base period by reference to the excess profits net income allocable to it in the manner provided in section 462 (i).

"(3) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a), where the acquiring corporation had not commenced business, within the meaning of section 461 (d), on or before the first day of its base period, the acquiring corporation shall not be entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 443 in the manner provided therein or as provided in this section.

"(f) Use by acquiring corporation of alternative average base period net income provided in the case of increase in capacity for production or operation in section 444: Where any corporation, a party to a transaction described in section 461 (a) which occurred after the close of the base period of the acquiring corporation, was entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 444, the acquiring corporation shall only be entitled to compute its average base period net income under such section where all of the corporations, parties to the transaction, (other than a corporation created incident to the transaction) were entitled to compute their average base period net incomes under sections 442 (d), 443, 444, 445 or 446, in which case the acquiring corporation may add an average base period net income computed under section 444, or an allocable portion thereof determined under section 462 (i), of any of the parties to the transaction to such other average base period net incomes for the purpose of determining its average base period net income after the transaction under the section applicable to it prior to the transaction. Where, in the case of a corporation entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 444, the transaction described in section 461 (a) occurred prior to the time at which any corporation a party to the transaction was entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 444, the Secretary, pursuant to regulations, shall provide for the extent to which and for the manner in which the acquiring corporation shall be entitled to compute its average base period net income under such section.

"(g) Use by acquiring corporation of alternative average base period net income provided for new corporations in section 445.—

"(1) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) which occurred during the base period of the acquiring corporation, such acquiring corporation shall be entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 445, in the manner provided therein, if such corporation had not commenced business, within the meaning of section 461 (d), prior to the beginning of its base period and, in applying section 445, the number of taxable years since the acquiring corporation is deemed to have commenced business under section 461 (d) shall be determinative.

"(2) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) which occurred after the close of the base period of an acquiring corporation which had not commenced business, within the meaning of section 461 (d), prior to the beginning of its base period—

"(A) where such transaction is a transaction other than a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E)—

"(i) and the transaction occurred after the close of the third taxable year after the commencement of business of the component corporation or corporations and of the acquiring corporation (unless such corporation was created incident to the transaction), the commencement of business for each such corporation being determined without regard to section 461 (d), the average base period net income of the acquiring corporation after the transaction shall be determined, for purposes of section 445, in lieu of in the manner provided by section 445 (b), by adding together the average base period net incomes of the acquiring corporation and of the component corporation or corporations as determined under that section as of the first day of the fourth such taxable year of each such corporation;

"(ii) and the transaction occurred prior to the close of the third taxable year after the commencement of business of either the acquiring corporation or of one or more of the component corporations, determined without regard to section 461 (d), but after the close of the third taxable year after the commencement of business of one or more of such corporations, the average base period net income of the acquiring corporation after the transaction shall be determined, for purposes of section 445, in lieu of in the manner provided by section 445 (b), by adding together the average base period net incomes determined under section 445 as of the first day of the fourth such taxable year of each such corporation in business for more than three taxable years and an average base period net income amount computed by the method specified in section 445 for each corporation not in business for three taxable years as though the day immediately prior to such transaction were the first day of such corporation's fourth such taxable year;

"(iii) and the transaction occurred prior to the close of the third taxable year after the commencement of business of the acquiring corporation and of the component corporation or corporations, the average base period net income of the acquiring corporation after the transaction shall be determined, for purposes of section 445, by the method specified in section 445, and, in applying that method, the number of taxable years since the acquiring corporation is deemed to have commenced business under section 461 (d) shall be determinative;

"(B) where such transaction is a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E)—

"(i) and the transaction occurred after the close of the third taxable year after the commencement of business of the component corporation, the average base period net income of the acquiring corporation after the transaction shall be that portion of the average base period net income of the component corporation, determined under section 445, which is allocable to the acquiring corporation under section 462 (i);

"(ii) and the transaction occurred prior to the close of the third taxable year after the commencement of business of the component corporation, the average base period net income of the acquiring corporation after the transaction shall be determined, for purposes of section 445, by the method specified in section 445 and, in applying that method, the number of taxable years since the acquiring corporation is deemed to have commenced business under section 461 (d) shall be determinative.

"(3) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) where the acquiring corporation had commenced business, within the meaning of section 461 (d), prior to the beginning of its base period, the acquiring corporation shall not be entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 445 in the manner provided therein or as provided in this section. In any such case, however, where the acquiring corporation (other than a corporation created incident to the transaction) and all of the component corporations were, prior to the transaction, entitled to compute their average base period net incomes under sections 442 (d), 443, 444, 445, or 446, the acquiring corporation may add an average base period net income computed under section 445 of any of the parties to the transaction to such other average base period net incomes for the purpose of determining its average base period net income after the transaction under the section applicable to it prior to the transaction.

"(h) Use by acquiring corporation of alternative average base period net income provided for depressed industries in section 446: Where any corporation, a party to a transaction described in section 461 (a) which occurred after the close of the base period of the acquiring corporation, was entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 446, the acquiring corporation shall only be entitled to compute its average base period net income under such section where all of the corporations, parties to the transaction (other than a corporation created incident to the transaction), were entitled to compute their average base period net incomes under sections 442 (d), 443, 444, 445, or 446, in which case the acquiring corporation may add an average base period net income computed under section 446, or an allocable portion thereof determined under section 462 (i), of any of the parties to the transaction to such other average base period net incomes for the purpose of determining its average base period net income after the transaction under the section applicable to it prior to the transaction. Where, in the case of a corporation entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 446, the transaction described in section 461 (a) occurred prior to the time at which any corporation a party to the transaction was entitled to compute its average base period net income under section 446, the Secretary, pursuant to regulations, shall provide for the extent to which and for the manner in which the acquiring corporation shall be entitled to compute its average base period net income under such section.

"(i) Allocation rules in the case of transactions described in section 461 (a) (1) (E)—

"(1) The amount of the component corporation's excess profits net income for any month which shall be taken into account by the acquiring corporation in the computation of its excess profits net income as provided in subsection (b) shall be such portion of the component corporation's excess profits net income, or of its substitute excess profits net income if computed under section 442 (c), for such month as the fair market value of the assets transferred to the acquiring corporation bears to the fair market value of the total assets of the component corporation as they existed immediately prior to such transaction.

"(2) In the case of a transaction which occurred after the close of the third taxable year after a component corporation commenced business, the amount of its average base period net income, if computed under section 445 (relating to new corporations), for such taxable year and for any taxable year thereafter which is allocable to the acquiring corporation shall be such portion of the component corporation's average base period net income computed under such section as the fair market value of the assets transferred by the component corporation to the acquiring corporation bears to the fair market value of the total assets of the component corporation as they existed immediately prior to the transaction.

"(3) For the purposes of section 461 (c) (4) (B), the average base period net income allocable to the component corporation, other than in the case of an average base period net income computed under section 445 (b) (1), shall be such portion of its average base period net income computed under section 435 (c) as the fair market value of the assets not transferred in the transaction bears to the fair market value of the assets held immediately prior to such transaction.

"(4) In the case of a transaction which occurred after the requirements of section 442 (d), 443, 444, or 446 are met by the component corporation, the amount of the component corporation's average base period net income, if computed under any of such sections, for such taxable year, which is allocable to the acquiring corporation, shall be such portion of the component corporation's average base period net income computed under such section as the fair market value of the assets transferred by the component corporation to the acquiring corporation bears to the fair market value of the total assets of the component corporation as they existed immediately prior to the transaction.

"(5) Pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary, a determination of the fair-market value of the properties and of the division thereof for the purpose of this subsection, may be made by agreement between all persons parties to the transaction, where the Secretary consents thereto. In no such case shall the aggregate of the excess profits net incomes or of the average base period net incomes allocated under the above paragraphs be in excess of 100 percent of the excess profits net income or of such average base period net income, as the case may be, of the component corporation.

"(6) Pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary, an allocation of excess profits net income or average base period net income for the purposes of this section may be made on the basis of the earnings experience of the assets transferred and retained in lieu of an allocation based on the fair market value of the assets if all of the parties to the transaction consent thereto and if it is established to the satisfaction of the Secretary that such an allocation fairly represents an identifiable earnings experience of each such group of assets. Except in the case of a transaction which occurred before December 1, 1950, in which the component corporation is a partnership, the aggregate of the excess profits net incomes or average base period net incomes allocated to the several parties to the transaction as provided in this paragraph shall not be in exces of 100 percent of the excess profits net income or of the average base period net income as the case may be of the component corporation.

"(7) In any case in which there is a determination of the fair market value of the properties or a determination of an allocation of excess profits net income or average base period net income based on identifiable earnings, such fair market values or excess profits net incomes or average base period net incomes so determined shall be binding upon all parties to the transactions for the excess profits tax taxable year for which determined and for all subsequent excess-profits tax taxable years.

"(8) Cross reference: For rules for the allocation of payroll, gross receipts, equity capital, borrowed capital, and capital additions and reductions, see sections 461 (c) (3), 462 (c), 463, and 464.

"(j) (1) If, after December 31, 1945—

"(A) the taxpayer acquired stock in another corporation, and thereafter such other corporation became a component corporation of the taxpayer, or

"(B) a corporation (hereinafter called 'first corporation') acquired stock in another corporation (hereinafter called 'second corporation'), and thereafter the first and second corporations became component corporations of the taxpayer, then to the extent that the consideration for such acquisition was not the issuance of the taxpayer's or first corporation's, as the case may be, own stock, the average base period net income of the taxpayer shall be reduced, and the transferred capital addition and reduction adjusted, in respect of the income and capital addition and reduction of the corporation whose stock was so acquired and in respect of the income and capital addition and reduction of any other corporation which at the time of such acquisition was connected directly or indirectly through stock ownership with the corporation whose stock was so acquired and which thereafter became a component corporation of the taxpayer, in such amounts and in such manner as shall be determined in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary. For the purposes of this paragraph, stock which has, in the hands of the taxpayer or first corporation, as the case may be, a basis determined with reference to the basis of stock previously acquired by the issuance of the taxpayer's or first corporation's, as the case may be, own stock, shall be considered as having been acquired in consideration of the issuance of the taxpayer's or first corporation's, as the case may be, own stock.

"(2) If during the taxable year for which tax is computed under this subchapter the taxpayer acquires assets in a transaction which constitutes it an acquiring corporation, the amount includible under subsection (a), attributable to such transaction, shall be limited to an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount computed without regard to this subsection as the number of days in the taxable year after such transaction bears to the total number of days in such taxable year.

"(k) In the case of a partnership which is a component corporation by virtue of section 461 (b) (5) and (6), the computations required by this part shall be made, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary, as if such partnership had been a corporation.

"(l) In the case of a taxpayer which becomes an acquiring corporation in any taxable year ending after June 30, 1950, if, at the beginning of the first taxable year of such corporation which ends after June 30, 1950, and at all times until the taxpayer became an acquiring corporation—

"(1) the taxpayer owned not less than 75 percent of each class of stock of each of the qualified component corporations involved in the transaction in which the taxpayer became an acquiring corporation; or

"(2) one of the qualified component corporations involved in the transaction owned not less tan 75 percent of each class of stock of the taxpayer, and of each of the other qualified component corporations involved in the transaction, the average base period net income of the taxpayer shall not be less than (A) the average base period net income of that one of its qualified component corporations involved in the transaction the average base period net income of which is greatest, or (B) the average base period net income of the taxpayer computed without regard to the base period net income of any of its qualified component corporations involved in the transaction. As used in this subsection, the term 'qualified component corporation' means a component corporation which was in existence and had commenced business (without regard to the provisions of sec. 461 (d)) on the date of the beginning of the taxpayer's base period.

"(m) Treatment of abnormalities in income in taxable period: In the case where an acquiring corporation in a transaction described in section 461 (a) which occurred prior to December 1, 1950, receives income which, under the provisions of section 456 (relating to abnormalities in income in taxable period), would be attributable, under section 456 (b), to a taxable year of a component corporation of such acquiring corporation, which taxable year closed prior to or with the close of the base period of the acquiring corporation, for purposes of section 456, such income, and all other income of the same class, of the component corporation for such year and previous taxable years shall be treated as income of the acquiring corporation."

"SEC. 463. Capital changes.

"(a) Taxpayer using part II of this subchapter: For the purposes of section 435 (g), if the transaction which constitutes a taxpayer an acquiring corporation occurs in a taxable year of the taxpayer which ends after June 30, 1950, and the taxpayer's average base period net income is computed by application of this part, the following rules shall apply in computing the net capital addition and net capital reduction of such acquiring corporation after such transaction:

"(1) Except with respect to a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), in the determination of the amounts of money and property paid in for stock or as paid in surplus or as a contribution to capital after the beginning of the taxable year of the acquiring corporation for the purposes of section 435 (g) (3) (A), there shall be added, as of the day after the transaction, the amounts of money and property paid in for stock or as paid in surplus or as a contribution to capital to a component corporation after the beginning of the taxable year of such component corporation and prior to the day of the transaction which constitutes such corporation a component corporation.

"(2) Except with respect to a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), in the determination of the amounts of distributions to shareholders which were not out of the earnings and profits of the taxable year of the acquiring corporation for the purposes of section 435 (g) (4) (A), there shall be added, as of the day after the transaction, the amounts of distributions to shareholders of a component corporation not out of the earnings and profits of its taxable year in which such transaction occurred and prior to such day.

"(3) Except with respect to a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), for the purpose of section 435 (g) (3) (B) and (g) (4) (B), for a taxable year of the acquiring corporation beginning after the date of the transaction the equity capital of the acquiring corporation at the beginning of the taxpayer's first taxable year under this subchapter shall be the aggregate of the equity capital of the acquiring corporation as of such date and the equity capital of a component corporation as of the first day of the first taxable year of such component corporation under this subchapter. This rule shall be modified pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary under section 462 (j) to the extent that the transaction is subject to that subsection.

"(4) Except with respect to a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), in the case of the taxable year in which the transaction occurred, for purposes of section 435 (g) (3), there shall be added as of the day of the transaction the amount, if any, by which the equity capital of a component corporation at the beginning of its taxable year in which the transaction occurred exceeds its equity capital at the beginning of its first taxable year under this subchapter, and, for purposes of section 435 (g) (4), there shall be added as of the day of the transaction the amount, if any, by which the equity capital of a component corporation at the beginning of its first taxable year under this subchapter exceeds its equity capital at the beginning of its taxable year in which the transaction occurred.

"(5) Except in the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), for the purposes of section 435 (g) (3) (C) and (g) (4) (C), in the computation of the daily borrowed capital of the acquiring corporation for the first day of such corporation's first taxable year under this subchapter there shall be added the daily borrowed capital of a component corporation for the first day of its first taxable year under this subchapter and in the computation of the average borrowed capital of the acquiring corporation for its taxable year in which such transaction occurred there shall be included the daily borrowed capital of a component corporation for that part of the acquiring corporation's taxable year prior to the transaction.

"(6) Except in the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), for the purposes of section 435 (g) (5) (C) and (D), in the computation of the original inadmissible assets of the acquiring corporation there shall be added the original inadmissible assets of a component corporation, and in the computation of the average inadmissible assets of the acquiring corporation for the taxable year of the transaction there shall be added the daily amounts attributable to the inadmissible assets of a component corporation for that part of the acquiring corporation's taxable year prior to the date of the transaction.

"(7) The Secretary shall prescribe by regulation such modification of the rules specified in this section as may be necessary to carry out the principles of such rules and the rules of section 435 (g) in cases involving intercorporate stock ownership, contributions, distributions, stock purchases, and loans between parties to a transaction described in section 461 (a), or their shareholders, prior to the date of such transaction.

"(8) In the case of an acquiring corporation in a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), for the purposes of section 435 (g) (3) (B) and (g) (4) (B), so much of the equity capital of the component corporation at the beginning of its first taxable year under this subchapter shall be allocated to the acquiring corporation as is proportionate to the ratio which the equity capital transferred to the acquiring corporation in the transaction bears to the equity capital of the component corporation immediately prior to the transaction. The amount so allocated shall be deemed to be the equity capital of the taxpayer as of the first day of its first taxable year under this subchapter.

"(9) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), for the purposes of section 435 (g) (3) (C) and (g) (4) (C), the daily borrowed capital of an acquiring corporation for the first day of such corporation's first taxable year under this subchapter shall be such portion of the daily borrowed capital of the component corporation for the first day of its first taxable year under this subchapter as the borrowed capital of the acquiring corporation immediately after the transaction bears to the borrowed capital of the component corporation as of the close of the day prior to the day of the transaction.

"(10) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), in the determination of the original inadmissible assets of an acquiring corporation for the purposes of section 435 (g) (5) (C) and (g) (5) (D), there shall be allocated to such corporation that proportion of the original inadmissible assets of the component corporation as is proportionate to the ratio which the inadmissible assets transferred to the acquiring corporation in the transaction bears to the total of the inadmissible assets held by the component corporation immediately prior to the transaction. The amount so allocated shall be deemed to be the original inadmissible assets of the acquiring corporation.

"(11) For purposes of the determination under section 435 (g) (6) and (7) of the amount to be added to the daily capital reduction in the case of a corporation a member of a controlled group such determination shall be made, pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary, in a manner consistent with the method provided in such sections.

"(12) In the case of a transaction other than that described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), to the extent that stock of a component corporation was acquired in an exchange for other than stock of the acquiring corporation within the meaning of section 462 (j), the basis of the assets of the component corporation shall be redetermined as provided in section 470 and such redetermination basis shall be used for all purposes of section 435 (g).

"(13) In the case of transactions described in section 462 (e) (1) (C), (e) (1) (B) and (e) (2) the net capital additions and reductions of the acquiring corporation after the transaction shall be determined under this section subject to the application, prior to the transaction, of section 443 (d) to each corporation which was a party to the transaction.

"(14) In the case of transactions described in section 462 (g) (2) and the second sentence of (g) (3), the net capital additions and reductions of the acquiring corporation after the transaction shall be determined under this section subject to the application, prior to the transaction, of section 445 (f) to each corporation which was a party to the transaction.

"(b) Rule where acquiring corporation is component of taxpayer: In cases where an acquiring corporation is a component of the taxpayer, and the transaction which constitutes such corporation an acquiring corporation occurs in a taxable year of such corporation which ends after June 30, 1950, for the purpose of determining the daily capital addition or reduction of the taxpayer the above rules shall be applied in a similar manner to determine the net capital addition or reduction of such acquiring corporation for each day after such transaction."

"SEC. 464. Capital changes during the base period.

"For the purposes of section 435 (f), if the transaction which constitutes the taxpayer an acquiring corporation occurred during or after the beginning of the second taxable year preceding the first taxable year of the acquiring corporation under this subchapter, and the acquiring corporation's average base period net income is computed by application of this part, the following rules shall apply in computing the base period capital addition of such acquiring corporation:

"(a) In the case of a transaction, other than a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E), which—

"(1) occurred during or after the first taxable year of the acquiring corporation under this subchapter, for the purposes of section 435 (f), the base period capital addition of the acquiring corporation for the taxable year in which the transaction occurred shall be the sum of:

"(A) the base period capital addition of the acquiring corporation, and

"(B) so much of the base period capital addition of a component corporation as is proportionate to the ratio which the number of days in the taxable year of the acquiring corporation after the transaction bears to the number of days in such taxable year; and the base period capital addition of the acquiring corporation for any taxable year thereafter shall be the aggregate of the base period capital addition of the acquiring corporation and the base period capital addition of such component corporation.

"(2) occurred during the taxable year of the acquiring corporation immediately preceding its first taxable year under this subchapter, its base period capital addition shall be computed after—

"(A) adding to its yearly base period capital for the immediately preceding taxable year (as defined in section 435 (f) (2) (A) (ii)) of the acquiring corporation the yearly base period capital for the immediately preceding taxable year (so defined) of a component corporation, and

"(B) adding to its yearly base period capital for the second preceding taxable year (as defined in section 435 (f) (2) (A) (iii)) of the acquiring corporation the yearly base period capital for the second preceding taxable year (so defined) of such component corporation.

"(3) occurred during the second taxable year of the acquiring corporation preceding its first taxable year under this subchapter, its base period capital addition shall be computed after adding to its yearly base period capital for the second preceding taxable year (as defined in section 435 (f) (2) (A) (iii)) of the acquiring corporation the yearly base period capital for the second preceding taxable year (so defined) of a component corporation.

"(b) In the case of a transaction described in section 461 (a) (1) (E) which—

"(1) occurred during or after the first taxable year of the component corporation under this subchapter, for purposes of section 435 (f), the base period capital addition of the acquiring corporation shall be such portion of the base period capital addition of the component corporation as is proportionate to the ratio which the fair market value of the assets transferred to the acquiring corporation in the transaction bears to the fair market value of the assets of a component corporation immediately prior to the transaction;

"(2) occurred during a taxable year of the component corporation which is or would be if it remained in existence, a taxable year preceding its first taxable year under this subchapter,

"(A) The yearly base period capital of the acquiring corporation for the year in which the transaction occurred shall be computed as of the day following the transaction;

"(B) If the taxable year of the acquiring corporation during which the transaction occurred is its first taxable year under this subchapter, its base period capital addition shall be computed by

"(i) treating as its yearly base period capital for the immediately preceding taxable year (as defined in section 435 (f) (2) (ii)) such portion of the yearly base period capital of the component corporation for the first day of the taxable year of the component corporation in which such transaction occurred, and

"(ii) treating as its yearly base period capital for the second preceding taxable year (as defined in section 435 (f) (2) (iii)) such portion of the yearly base period capital of the component corporation for the first day of the taxable year of the component corporation before the taxable year of the component corporation in which the transaction occurred as is proportionate to the ratio which the fair market value of the assets transferred to the acquiring corporation in the transaction bears to the fair market value of the assets of the component corporation immediately prior to the transaction.

"(C) If the taxable year of the acquiring corporation during which the transaction occurred is its taxable year immediately preceding its first taxable year under this subchapter its base period capital addition shall be computed by treating as its yearly base period capital for the second preceding taxable year (as defined in section 435 (f) (2) (iii)) such portion of the base period capital of the component corporation for the first day of the taxable year of the component corporation in which such transaction occurred as is proportionate to the ratio which the fair market value of the assets transferred to the acquiring corporation in the transaction bears to the fair market value of the assets of the component corporation immediately prior to the transaction.

"(3) Was a transaction in which a part of the assets of a component corporation were transferred to an acquiring corporation which had commenced business prior to such transaction, the base period capital addition of such acquiring corporation shall be computed pursuant to regulations prescribed by the Secretary."

"SEC. 471. Exchanges.

"For the purposes of section 458—

"(a) Definitions, etc.: For the purposes of this section—

"(1) 'Exchange', 'transferor', and 'transferee': The term 'exchange' means a transaction by which one corporation (hereinafter called 'transferee') receives property of another corporation (hereinafter called 'transferor') and the basis of the property received, in the hands of the transferee, for the purposes of section 458 (d) is determined by reference to the basis in the hands of the transferor.

"(2) Determination of basis of property received: The basis, in the hands of the transferee, of the property of the transferor received by the transferee upon the exchange shall be determined in accordance with section 458 (d).

"(b) Rule: In the application of section 458 (d) to a transferee upon an exchange in determining the amount paid in for stock of the transferee, or as paid-in surplus or as a contribution to capital of the transferee, in connection with such exchange, only an amount shall be deemed to have been so paid in equal to the excess of the basis in the hands of the transferee of the property of the transferor received by the transferee upon the exchange over the sum of—

"(1) The amount of any liability of the transferor assumed upon the exchange and of any liability subject to which such property was so received, plus

"(2) The amount of any liability of the transferee (not arising out of any liability described in paragraph (1)) constituting consideration for the property so received, plus

"(3) The aggregate of the amount of any money and the fair market value of any other property (other than such stock and other than property described in paragraphs (1) and (2) transferred to the transferor.

"(c) Reduction in daily invested capital: In the application of section 458 (c) to a transferee upon an exchange, the daily invested capital for any day after such exchange shall be reduced by an amount equal to the amount by which the sum of the amounts specified in paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of subsection (b) exceeds the basis in the hands of the transferee of the property of the transferor received upon the exchange."

On page 275, after line 7, to insert:

"SEC. 472. Invested capital adjustment at the time of tax-free intercorporate liquidations.

"For purposes of section 458—

"(a) Definition of intercorporate liquidation: As used in this section, the term 'intercorporate liquidation' means the receipt (whether or not after June 30, 1950) by a corporation (hereinafter called the 'transferee') of property in complete liquidation of another corporation (hereinafter called the 'transferor'), to which—

"(1) the provisions of section 112 (b) (6), or the corresponding provision of a prior revenue law, is applicable or

"(2) a provision of law is applicable prescribing the nonrecognition of gain or loss in whole or in part upon such receipt (including a provision of the regulations applicable to a consolidated income or excess profits tax return but not including section 112 (b) (7), (9), or (10) or a corresponding provision of a prior revenue law), but only if none of such property so received is a stock or a security in a corporation the stock or securities of which are specified in the law applicable to the receipt of such property as stock or securities permitted to be received (or which would be permitted to be received if they were the sole consideration) without the recognition of gain.

"(b) Definition of plus adjustment and minus adjustment: For the purposes of this section—

"(1) Plus adjustment: The term 'plus adjustment' means the amount, with respect to an intercorporate liquidation, determined to be equal to the amount by which the aggregate of the amount of money received by the transferee in such intercorporate liquidation, and of the adjusted basis at the time of such receipt of all property (other than money) so received, exceeds the sum of—

"(A) the aggregate of the adjusted basis of each share of stock with respect to which such property was received; such adjusted basis of each share to be determined immediately prior to the receipt of any property in such liquidation with respect to such share, and

"(B) the aggregate of the liabilities of the transferor assumed by the transferee in connection with the receipt of such property, of the liabilities (not assumed by the transferee) to which such property so received was subject, and of any other consideration (other than the stock with respect to which such property was received) given by the transferee for such property so received.

"(2) Minus adjustment: The term "minus adjustment" means the amount, with respect to an intercorporate liquidation, determined to be equal to the amount by which the sum of—

"(A) the aggregate of the adjusted basis of each share of stock with respect to which such property was received; such adjusted basis of each share to be determined immediately prior to the receipt of any property in such liquidation with respect to such share, and

"(B) the aggregate of the liabilities of the transferor assumed by the transferee in connection with the receipt of such property, of the liabilities (not assumed by the transferee) to which such property so received was subject, and of any other consideration (other than the stock with respect to which such property was received) given by the transferee for such property so received exceeds the aggregate of the amount of the money so received and of the adjusted basis, at the time of receipt, of all property (other than money) so received.

"(3) Rules for application of paragraphs (1) and (2): In determining the plus adjustment or minus adjustment with respect to any share, the computation shall be made in the same manner as is prescribed in paragraphs (1) and (2) of this subsection, except that there shall be brought into account only that part of each item which is determined to be attributable to such share.

"(c) Rules for the application of this section—

"(1) Stock having cost basis.—The property received by a transferee in an intercorporate liquidation attributable to a share of stock having in the hands of the transferee a basis determined to be a cost basis, shall be considered to have, for the purposes of subsection (b), an adjusted basis at the time so received determined as follows:

"(A) The aggregate of the property (other than money) held by the transferor at the time of the acquisition by the transferee of control of the transferor (or, if such share was acquired after the acquisition of such control, at the time of the acquisition of such share, or, if such control was not acquired, at the time immediately prior to the receipt of any property in the intercorporate liquidation in respect of such share) shall be deemed to have an aggregate basis equal to the amount obtained by (i) multiplying the amount of the adjusted basis at such time of such share in the hands of the transferee by the aggregate number of share units in the transferor at such time (the interest represented by such share being taken as the share unit), and (ii) adjusting for the amount of money on hand and the liabilities of the transferor at such time.

"(B) The basis which property of the transferor is deemed to have under subparagraph (A) at the time therein specified shall be used in determining the basis of property subsequently acquired by the transferor the basis of which is determined with reference to the basis of property specified in subpargraph (A).

"(C) The basis which property of the transferor is deemed to have under subparagraphs (A) and (B) at the time therein specified shall be used in determining all subsequent adjustments to the basis of such property.

"(D) The property so received by the transferee shall be deemed to have, at the time of its receipt, the same basis it is deemed to have under the foregoing provisions of this paragraph in the hands of the transferor, or in the case of property not specified in subparagraph (A) or (B), the same basis it would have had in the hands of the transferor.

"(E) Only such part of the aggregate property received by the transferee in the intercorporate liquidation as is attributable to such share shall be considered as having the adjusted basis which property is deemed to have under subparagraphs (A), (B), (C), and (D) of this paragraph.

"(2) Basis of stock not a cost basis: The property received by a transferee in an intercorporate liquidation attributable to a share of stock having in the hands of the transferee a basis determined to be a basis other than a cost basis shall, for the purposes of subsection (b), be considered to have, at the time of its receipt, the basis it would have had had the first sentence of section 113 (a) (15) been applicable.

"(3) Definition of control: As used in this subsection, the term 'control' means the ownership of stock possessing at least 80 percent of the total combined voting power of all classes of stock entitled to vote and the ownership of at least 80 percent of the total number of shares of all other classes of stock (except nonvoting stock which is limited and preferred as to dividends), but only if in both cases such ownership continues until the completion of the intercorporate liquidation.

"(d) Adjustment of equity invested capital: If property is received by the transferee in an intercorporate liquidation, in computing the equity invested capital of the transferee for any day following the completion of such intercorporate liquidation—

"(1) with respect to any share of stock in the transferor having in the hands of the transferee, immediately prior to the receipt of any property in such intercorporate liquidation, a basis determined to be a cost basis, the earnings and profits or deficit in earnings and profits of the transferee shall be computed as if on the day following the completion of such intercorporate liquidation the transferee had realized a recognized gain equal to the amount of the plus adjustment in respect of such share, or had sustained a recognized loss equal to the amount of the minus adjustment in respect of such share;

"(2) with respect to any share of stock in the transferor having in the hands of the transferee, immediately prior to the receipt of any property in such intercorporate liquidation, a basis determined to be a basis other than a cost basis, there shall be treated as an amount includible in the sum specified in section 458 (d) the amount of the plus adjustment with respect to such share, or as an amount includible in the sum specified in section 458 (e) the amount of the minus adjustment with respect to such share.

"(e) Invested capital basis.—

"The adjusted basis which property received by the transferee in an intercorporate liquidation is considered to have under the provisions of subsection (c) at the time of its receipt shall be thereafter treated as the adjusted basis, in lieu of the adjusted basis otherwise prescribed, in computing any amount, determined by reference to the basis of such property in the hands of the transferee, entering into the computation of the invested capital of the transferee, or of any other corporation the computation of the invested capital of which is determined by reference to the basis of such property in the hands of the transferee.

"(f) Statutory mergers and consolidations: If a corporation owns stock in another corporation and such corporations are merged or consolidated in a statutory merger or consolidation, then for the purposes of this section and section 458 such stock shall be considered to have been acquired (in such statutory merger or consolidation) by the corporation resulting from the statutory merger or consolidation, and the properties of such other corporation attributable to such stock to have been received by such resulting corporation as a transferee from such other corporation as a transferor in an intercorporate liquidation.

"(g) Determinations.—

"(1) Regulations: Any determination which is required to be made under this section (including determinations in applying this section in cases where there is a series of transferees of the property and cases where the stock of the transferor is acquired by the transferee from another corporation, and the determinations of the basis and adjusted basis which property or items thereof have or are considered to have) shall be made in accordance with regulations which shall be prescribed by the Secretary. If the transferor or the transferee is a foreign corporation, the provisions of this section shall apply to such extent and under such conditions and limitations as may be provided in such regulations.

"(2) Application to liquidation extending over long period: The Secretary is authorized to prescribe rules similar to those provided in this section with respect to the days within the period beginning with the date on which the first property is received in the intercorporate liquidation and ending with the day of its completion; and the extent to which, and the conditions and limitations under which, such rules are to be applicable."

The consent shall be applicable to the taxable year for which filed and to each consecutive subsequent taxable year for which a consolidated return is filed."

On page 292, line 12, to change the section number from "202" to "302."

On page 293, line 16, to change the section number from "203" to "303."

On page 294, line 2, after the word "section", to strike out "449" and insert "451", and in line 7, after the word "section", to strike out "449" and insert "451."

On page 294, line 9, to change the section number from "204" to "304."

On page 295, line 2, after the word "thereof", to strike out "'448 and 451'" and insert "'450 and 453'".

On page 295, line 9, after the word "section", to strike out "447" and insert "449."

On page 295, line 13, to change the section number from "205" to "305."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present parliamentary situation is that the bill is open to amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. That is correct.

Before I take my seat, Mr. President, I desire to say what I think is obvious and, I am sure, well understood by all members of the committee, namely—to paraphrase the words of the poet—that whoever expects a perfect excess-profits tax bill to see, will see it never, for such never has been, and never will be.

However, in view of the rather long and tiring presentation I have made, I think the taxing authorities may at least find set forth the congressional intent and purpose and design of this bill, and will be governed in their administration by the congressional intent, as we have sought to express it here.

I now yield the floor.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I submit on behalf of myself and the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. I should like to have the chairman of the committee examine the amendment and see whether it will be agreeable to the committee to accept it.

I may say to the Senate that the only purpose of the amendment is as follows: The base period provided in the bill is from January 1, 1946, to December 31, 1949. The provisions with reference to a growth company primarily are, among other things, that it must have an earning period for the last 2 years of the base period and the first 2 years of the base period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend for a moment, while the amendment is read for the benefit of the other Members of the Senate?

Mr. KERR. Yes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 42, in line 24, it is proposed to strike out "the beginning of its base period" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "May 1, 1946."

On page 43, after the period in line 17, it is proposed to insert:

In the case of a taxpayer which commenced business after the beginning of its base period—

(i) the total payroll for the first half of its base period shall be increased by an amount which bears the same ratio to such total payroll as the number of days in such base period before the day the taxpayer commenced business bears to the total number of days in the first half of such base period, and

(ii) the gross receipts for the first half of its base period shall be increased by an amount which bears the same ratio to such gross receipts as the number of days in such base period before the day the taxpayer commenced business bears to the total number of days in the first half of such base period.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KERR. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. My understanding is that thi amendment is designed to apply the growth formula, that is, the treatment accorded to rapidly growing corporations, to a corporation which was actually incorporated or began business some 30 days after the beginning of the base period. Is my understanding of it correct?

Mr. KERR. It is. The formula would apply to such a corporation up to, but for not more than 4 months; in other words, if the corporation was in business, beginning on or before May 1, 1946.

Mr. GEORGE. That is 1946, the first year of the new base period. Is that correct?

Mr. KERR. That is correct.

Mr. GEORGE. For myself, I should have no objection to the amendment. The corporation could be treated as a new corporation, a privilege which the Senator may not desire to take away from it. Is the amendment in the alternative?

Mr. KERR. Yes; it is.

Mr. GEORGE. We have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] is agreed to. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK. On page 183, at the end of line 2, it is proposed to insert "to the extent the taxpayer has withdrawn funds from deposits made under section 511 or 607 to construct or acquire a vessel or vessels, the adjusted invested capital determined under section 437 (b) (2) for each such vessel shall be computed under the provisions of this paragraph as though the withdrawn funds expended in its construction or acquisition were still on deposit in such fund."

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, the proposed amendment has to do with the subject of handling deposits under the Merchant Marine Act. It has just been handed to me. I am told that it is a very vital and just amendment. I regret that I am not in position to vouch for the fact, but we seem to be moving h re at great speed. If the distinguished chairman of the committee has no objection, I should like to offer the amendment, so that it may go to conference, and may receive study in the meantime.

Mr. GEORGE. I have no objection to taking it to conference, I may say to the distinguished Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN]. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and request to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK. On page 295, after line 12, it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 304. Amortization deduction: Section 124A of the Internal Revenue Code is hereby amended by striking out all of the first sentence of section 124A (e) after the words "emergency period", and inserting in lieu thereof a period.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee to take this amendment to conference. I do not like to offer amendments on the floor, but this amendment has been considered in committee. In fact, it has been considered in committee on previous occasions. The provision was in the World War II excise-profits-tax bill. I should like to have the chairman take it to conference, to see whether something can be worked out in connection with the problem which it is meant to correct.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, this is an amendment to the amortization section of the Revenue Act of 1950. It is an amendment which was discussed in committee. The apparent necessity for it arises out of regulations which have been adopted, and which I regret very much to say may prevent the investment of private capital in the war plants and facilities which we are endeavoring to help or to make possible. I think the amendment is controversial, not because it is in conflict with the purpose which the committee had in mind at the time, but because it is not in harmony with the regulations this year. I do not mind taking the amendment to conference, but I should like to have it understood that it is accepted only for conference.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. That will be understood. If the chairman will take it to conference, I shall be perfectly satisfied. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a very brief explanation of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us the purpose of the amendment? I may say I do not think very highly of last-minute amendments, written on single sheets of paper, with but one copy available. Senators do not know what they are voting on. I do not know but that this particular amendment may be a good one; but we are legislating under difficulties when a Senator offers a last-minute amendment of which no copies are available to the other Members of the Senate. Perhaps the Senator from Colorado will tell us what his amendment proposes, before it is sent to conference.

AMORTIZATION DEDUCTION

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, as a part of the Revenue Act of 1950, the Congress provided for 5-year amortization of facilities certified as essential to defense purposes. This provision was substantially a reenactment as to facilities acquired and to be acquired in the present and future years of operation of a like provision applicable to World War II facilities.

In the committee's consideration of this provision, the suggestion was made that the amount of the facility subject to amortization should perhaps be reduced by that portion of the facility representing its probable economic usefulness after 5 years. This proposal was rejected and no such basis for reduction was recognized by the bill as finally enacted.

Since the enactment of the 1950 law, regulations have been promulgated by the certifying authority adopting the very provision which the Congress rejected. Apparently, support for this action was believed to be found in a clause of the amortization provisions authorizing the inclusion in the amortizable basis of a facility of only such portion of the cost as the certifying authority certifies as attributable to defense purposes. Actually, this clause was intended to serve an entirely different purpose, namely, to make express provision for partial amortization of facilities used simultaneously for defense purposes in part, and for nondefense purposes in part.

It is the purpose of the amendment to overrule this erroneous administrative construction of the amortization provision. It is accomplished by repealing the clause in the act on which the administrative action was supposed to have been based. It is not believed that this clause is necessary for the purposes which it was originally intended to serve, and its deletion from the law will prevent the future reduction of the amortizable basis of facilities on grounds which the Congress did not contemplate.

I hope that is clear to the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. JOHNSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I have an amendment which is lying on the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 39, line 2, after the comma, it is proposed to insert the following: "or the excess profits credit computed under section 713 (but without the benefit of subsection (f) or sec. 722) for the last taxable year of the taxpayer beginning prior to January 1, 1946, whichever is the greater."

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, this amendment is couched in technical language, and I desire to make very plain for the record what it does.

The amendment provides an alternative earnings credit based upon a 1936-39 income.

It is prompted by the fact that some industries and firms, contrary to the general experience, have been depressed throughout the postwar period and have no excess-profits-tax credit whatsoever based upon 1946–49 income. In some instances, the new relief provision relating to "depressed industry subgroups" is of no assistance because the depressed condition has continued through the current year. In other words, Mr. President, they are still losing money.

It is believed that as a matter of principle any taxpayer should be entitled as a minimum to the use of the same earnings credit which it used in 1945 under the World War II law. This is the credit to which it would have been entitled if the excess-profits tax had not been repealed. It makes no allowance for the tremendous price inflation which has occurred in the meantime.

The amendment would make provision for such an alternative credit, permitting the taxpayer to have the benefit of capital additions only with the beginning of its first taxable year under the new excess-profits tax.

Under the amendment, the World War II credit would be computed without the benefit of the so-called normal growth provisions (section 713 (f)) and without the benefit of section 722, the "abnormality" section.

Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I must admit that I did not catch the purport of the amendment as read by the clerk. Will the Senator read it again?

Mr. McMAHON. On page 39, line 2, after the comma, it is proposed to add the following language: "or the excess profits credit computed under section 713 (but without the benefit of subsection (f) or section 722) for the last taxable year of the taxpayer beginning prior to January 1, 1946, whichever is the greater."

The purpose of the amendment, I say to the Senator from Georgia, is to provide for companies which are still losing money in the current year an opportunity to take the 1936 to 1939 base, which was used as the base under the provision of the excess-profits-tax law in the last war, from 1939 through 1945. In other words, if we had not repealed the excess-profits-tax law they would still be paying under the provision which I should like the Senator to accept and take to conference.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does he propose giving an alternative or an election to the corporation which is still losing money, and which has lost money, to use the old base under the World War II Act and without any increase in the amount?

Mr. McMAHON. That is correct; to use the 1936–39 base when the company, perhaps, did make some money, whereas today it is making nothing at all.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McMAHON. I yield.

Mr. LANGER. Would there be a decrease in the amount?

Mr. GEORGE. They would not have to use it; it would be in the alternative. They could use it, or they could take the payment provided in the bill for a deficit corporation, possibly, or a depressed industry.

Mr. McMAHON. However, we take away from them the use of the abnormality action.

Mr. GEORGE. That is correct.

Mr. President, I have no objection to this amendment. I do not know that I am authorized by the committee to accept it. The committee considered the question very seriously, but, as suggested to us in committee and as urged upon the committee, we were asked to permit the corporation to take the old basis, 1936 to 1939, plus 100 or 150 percent, or an increase of some amount. I think that operated against favorable consideration of the amendment in the committee. As I understand all the amendment now does, in effect, is to provide that in computing the base the taxpayer shall not be reduced below what he would have had in 1936 to 1939.

Mr. McMAHON. That is correct.

Mr. GEORGE. That is really the effect of it, is it not?

Mr. McMAHON. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. And without any increase in it. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee a question. I do so because there are 80 companies located in Massachusetts producing all types of electronic equipment, including television sets, and employing 35,200 persons.

I am informed that the growth company qualification provisions of H. R. 9827 as reported by the Senate Finance Committee excludes 61 percent of the set manufacturers and their suppliers in the television manufacturing industry, producing more than 80 percent of the output, who are equally as true growth companies as the 39 percent who qualify. On page 27 of the committee report on the excess-profits-tax bill it is stated that—

> A floor amendment will be offered to provide further liberalization as to the qualification for determining growth under this.

I should like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Finance whether the amendment to be offered by the committee would take care of the other 61 percent of the television manufacturing industry, particularly the suppliers of parts, such as resistors, capacitors, and so forth? I understand from a very brief conversation with the Senator from Georgia that an amendment was drafted, which was not satisfactory, and that it is being redrafted, so that it may be taken to conference. I understand the amendment would be sufficiently to cover the question I have asked the Senator from Georgia. Is that correct?

Mr. GEORGE. An amendment is now being drafted, and we are awaiting its arrival on the floor before offering it. Whether it would bring in the rapidly growing group I would not be able to say. It is our hope that the amendment will accord the growth treatment to a great many companies which are now producing new products or which have had a rapid abnormal expansion in their business. At least it will be sufficiently broad so that in conference we may have elbow room to consider any more appropriate amendment which may be suggested.

I may say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the House formula is very restrictive. In the first place, it excludes any rapidly growing corporation which, at the beginning of the base period, had assets—and note the word "assets"—of $20,000,000. I am told that there are some seven or eight television companies which had at the beginning of the base period—that is, January 1, 1946—assets which were greatly in excess of $20,000,000. They would be excluded. We are now undertaking to accord to them a treatment which I believe will afford relief to a great many of them and will enable most of them to qualify as growth companies and those receiving the benefits of the growth formula. I will say to the Senator that is the purpose we have in mind. Certainly we hope that it will be broad enough at least to give us room for action in conference.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the statement of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I shall be very glad to have the amendment read as soon as it is received. The amendment has not yet been received, but it is coming over.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, have all committee amendments been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All committee amendments were agreed to en bloc.

Mr. CAPEHART. Are we now estopped from offering amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Any Senator has the right to offer an amendment.

Mr. CAPEHART. Any amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct, under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. GEORGE. I send forward a technical amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK. On page 143, line 21, it is proposed to strike out the letter "A" and insert in lieu thereof the letter "B."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I send forward another amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK. On page 111, line 14, after the word "income", it is proposed to insert "or 33 percent of its net income."

Mr. GEORGE. It was thought wise to put it in the alternative.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I send forward another technical amendment, which is designed to correct an error in the bill, and I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK. On page 142, line 13, after the word "addition", it is proposed to insert "and without regard to section 437 (b) (2) (C)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I have another technical amendment which I desire to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK. On page 143 it is proposed to substitute a semicolon for the period at the end of line 9, and insert the following:

except that in the case of a corporation described in subsections (c) (1) (A), (c) (1) (B), (c) (2), or (c) (4), the corporate books of account of which are maintained in accordance with systems of accounts prescribed by an appropriate regulatory body (or, if not so prescribed, are maintained in accordance with the uniform systems of accounts prescribed by the Federal Power Commission or the National Association of Railway and Utility Commissioners), in determining the amount computed under section 440, the amount attributable to each asset held at any time during such taxable year shall be determined according to such corporate books of account.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I understand the purpose of the amendment is to correct an error, the error being that under the bill as it was reported utilities would have had to compute the value of their intangibles, which was clearly an error, because we are dealing here with tangible assets.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I have another amendment, which has not yet been reduced to writing. It involves simply a correction of a date. On page 45, line 11, it is proposed to strike out "1950" and to insert in lieu thereof "1951." The amendment would simply change a date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be read.

The ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK. On page 296, line 20, it is proposed to insert the following:

SEC. 306. Payments to encourage exploration, development, and mining for defense purposes.

Section 22 (b) is amended by adding the following new paragraph:

"(15) Payments to encourage exploration, development, and mining for defense purposes: The amount paid to a taxpayer by the United States (or any agency or instrumentality thereof), whether by grant or loan, and whether or not repayable, for the encouragement of exploration, development, or mining of critical and strategic minerals or metals pursuant to or in connection with any undertaking approved by the United States (or any of its agencies or instrumentalities) and for which an accounting is made or required to be made to an appropriate governmental agency, and the forgiveness or discharge of any of such amount, shall be excluded in computing excess profits net incomes; and any expenditures (other than expenditures made after the repayment of such grant or loan) attributable to such grant or loan shall not be deductible by the taxpayer as an expense nor increase the basis of the taxpayer's property either for determining gain or loss on sale, exchange, or other disposition or for computing depletion or depreciation, but upon the repayment of any portion of any such grant or loan which has been expended in accordance with the terms thereof such deductions and such increase in basis shall to the extent of such repayment be allowed as if made at the time of such repayment."

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, Senators will remember that we passed the Defense Production Act of 1950 for the encouragement, exploration, development, and mining of strategic minerals and metals. I am told that the Bureau of Mines is drawing up a program of that nature. Of course, it would be rather absurd for the Government to be giving gifts or grants to aid that objective, and at the same time levying taxes on its own money. The purpose of this amendment is to relieve grants and loans of that type from income surtax or excess profits tax.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I yield.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I understand that representatives of the American Mining Congress appeared before the committee and made some suggestions. Do I correctly understand that, in a general way, those suggestions have been embodied in the Senator's amendment?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Not all of them; but the substance of this amendment is the same as the substance of an amendment proposed by the American Mining Congress.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Do I correctly understand that this amendment exempts subsidy payments or bonuses for the production of minerals?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. From the excess profits tax?

Mr. MILLIKIN. From the excess profits tax and the income surtax.

Mr. GEORGE. They are exempt from the excess profits tax.

Mr. MILLIKIN. We already have a provision which does that, but that would not serve the purpose which was intended. The mining interests have been very much agitated about the exclusion of the other tax, because they say that they cannot get a mine going if we do not exempt also the normal tax and surtax.

Mr. GEORGE. On the bonus payments?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. On principle I have no objection to the amendment. As the distinguished Senator knows, I have tried not to get into the income tax in this bill any further than absolutely necessary for the general purposes of an excess-profits tax.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The purpose of the emergency legislation to which I have referred would, I respectfully suggest, be frustrated if we did not have something of the nature of this amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. I will not offer any objection to it. We can look at it in conference. I am anxious to avoid any trouble in amending the income-tax act.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I gladly yield.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The Senator from Colorado was present at the session of the Committee on Finance before which I appeared urging that the mineral trona be included among those which, under section 448, I believe, are excluded from the excess-profits tax because of the principle that it is desirable to promote the production of minerals which are valuable in defense. As I understand, the amendment which the Senator now proposes has nothing to do with that subject.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Nothing whatever.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. As I understand, this amendment deals solely with——

Mr. MILLIKIN. With the money which the Government itself will grant or loan to encourage exploration, development, and mining of strategic minerals and metals.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In other words, it deals with the provisions of the Defense Production Act by which we sought to stimulate, by Government advances, the production of certain minerals.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Exactly.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MILLIKIN. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. If we do not exempt these grants, the Government will have to provide about twice as much in order that the recipients of the grants may have enough money to pay the tax.

Mr. MILLIKIN. The point is very well taken, and I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma will be stated.

The ASSISTANT JOURNAL CLERK. On page 145, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "within a"; in line 17, it is proposed to strike out "single area or region in one or more States"; on the same page it is proposed to strike out lines 19 through 26; on page 146, it is proposed to strike out lines 1 and 2 and insert in lieu thereof "(2) the unregulated rates have been and are substantially as favorable to users and consumers as are the regulated rates."

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, there is included in the bill with reference to the particular language where the revenue is derived from unregulated rates, a provision which permits a regulated utility to qualify from its operation of a single interconnected and coordinated system within a single area or region in one or more States. The purpose of this amendment is to apply to the principle of the qualification rather than to the limited area of the qualification. As I understand, it carries out the intent of the committee when the other language was formulated and adopted, and does not change the purpose for which the included language was written.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, may I ask which words are proposed to be stricken?

Mr. KERR. On page 145, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "within a"; in line 17, it is proposed to strike out "single area or region in one or more States"; it is proposed to strike out beginning with line 19 on page 145 and continuing through line 2 on page 146, and substitute therefore the words "the unregulated rates have been and are substantially as favorable to users and consumers as are the regulated rates."

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, is this amendment intended to cover a case in which a utility may be entirely in a regulated territory, but some of its sales, such as sales to other utilities, are not regulated? Is that the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. KERR. If I understand the Senator's question, that is one of the purposes.

Mr. TAFT. Such a situation was referred to by the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON]. As I understand, this amendment is intended to cover a case in which a utility is partly in regulated territory and partly in unregulated territory. If this amendment is made, it also covers a case in which a utility is partly regulated, as to some of its sales, but not as to other sales.

Mr. KERR. The Senator is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia if he will now entertain an amendment such as I proposed when I appeared before the committee, to include the mineral trona among the strategic minerals defined on page 148, beginning in line 14. Within the past 4 or 5 years a large natural deposit of trona has been discovered in my State. I believe that it is the largest in the world; certainly it is the largest in the United States.

Trona produces soda ash which is very helpful in the production of uranium, as well as other commodities valuable for defense and in the production of petroleum. It is a substance which the National Production Authority placed under inventory control under the very first regulation which was issued this year. It seemed to me that in all the circumstances, since it does have these defense applications, it might be well to include trona in the bill among these items.

I understand from conversations with some members of the committee that the committee did not act favorably upon the amendment, largely because not sufficient evidence had been received. In these circumstances it occurs to me that the amendment could well go to conference.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, we did not have sufficient information about the production and use of trona, and we thought the amendment ought to be offered on the floor, so the distinguished Senator from Wyoming or perhaps other Senators might tell us something about the matter and put something in the RECORD that would justify its inclusion. As I understand, this is a domestic mineral.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is a domestic mineral.

Mr. GEORGE. Is it found outside the United States also in great quantities?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; not in great quantities. That is my understanding. Soda ash, which is refined from trona is now manufactured by synthetic process. In this country it is found in nature, in the substance called trona which is now being mined in my State.

Mr. GEORGE. And is it a necessary strategic metal or mineral?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That was the information which I received; and that view is sustained, I think, by the fact that the product was placed under inventory control by the Production Board under the Defense Production Act.

Mr. GEORGE. The committee did not raise any objection to inclusion in this section of that substance, but we did not have adequate information. Perhaps in conference there might be some adverse testimony given.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. That is true. I was going to say that if the Senator from Georgia would be willing to accept the amendment and take it to conference, I would undertake to supply such additional information as I can.

Mr. GEORGE. I would be very glad to do it.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, on page 148, line 21, after the comma at the end of the line, I offer the amendment to insert the word "trona."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I now send forward to the desk the amendment relating to the growth formula and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 42, commencing with line 22, it is proposed to strike out through line 17 on page 43, and insert:

This subsection if the taxpayer commenced business before the beginning of its base period and if either—

(A) (i) the total assets of the taxpayer as of the first day of its base period (when added to the total assets for such day of all corporations with which the taxpayer has the privilege under section 141 of filing a consolidated return for its first taxable year under this subchapter), determined under paragraph (3), did not exceed $20,000,000, and

(ii) the total payroll of taxpayer (as determined under par. (4)) for the last half of its base period is 130 percent or more of its total payroll for the first half of its base period, or the gross receipts of the taxpayer (as determined under par. (5)) for the last half of its base period is 150 percent or more of its gross receipts for the first half of its base period; or

(B) (i) the taxpayer's net sales for the period beginning January 1, 1950, and ending June 30, 1950, when multiplied by two, equals or exceeds 150 percent of its net sales for the calendar year 1948, and

(ii) 50 percent or more of the taxpayer's net sales for the calendar year 1949 is attributable to a product, or class of products (including any article in which such product or class of products is the principal component) of a kind not generally available to the public at any time prior to January 1, 1946, and

(iii) the amount of the taxpayer's net sales which is attributable to such product or class of similar products, for the calendar year 1946 is 5 percent or less of the amount of its net sales so attributable for the calendar year 1949.

For the purposes of this subparagraph, the term "net sales" with respect to any period means the total amount received or accrued during such period from the sale, exchange, or other disposition of stock in trade of the taxpayer or other property of a kind which would properly be included in the inventory of the taxpayer if on hand at the close of the taxable year, or property held by the taxpayer primarily for sale to customers in the ordinary course of its trade or business; reduced by the amount of discounts, returns, and allowances paid or incurred for such period.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am advised that the amendment will make the growth formula under the bill available to corporations which do not meet the tests under the House bill, but which have evidenced real growth as the result of a rapid step-up in sales of a product of a kind which was not generally available to the public at any time before 1946. For example, the amendment will cover corporations experiencing real growth in the television manufacturing field. This amendment, of course, is not designed to provide relief in those cases where there is a modification of a product, such as an improvement or change in the style. As an example of that statement, a new automobile is not intended to be treated as a new product for the purposes of this provision.

If the amendment is effective to bring under the formula any corporation, then, of course, it would be entitled to the growth treatment provided in the bill.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. Would the additional qualification permit the company with more than $20,000,000 of assets to qualify as a growth company?

Mr. GEORGE. It would if it meets any one of these tests because the language is in the alternative. In other words, this test commences with "or." So my understanding is that it would permit such a company as the Senator mentions to qualify. Apparently the amendment would throw open the matter in conference.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. As I understand, the amendment is not so phrased as to include corporations such as the General Motors Corp. or other companies whose incomes are considerable.

Mr. GEORGE. No. It would not cover the case of change of model of an automobile or anything of that kind. It must be confined as the amendment indicates.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia if this new amendment, which I have not had the opportunity of course to read, but which I understand applies to growth companies——

Mr. GEORGE. It is intended to.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Will it apply to companies with assets as great as $20,000,000?

Mr. GEORGE. More than $20,000,000, if they meet the test here laid down. We do not remove the $20,000,000 corporation from the operations of the provision, but this is another alternative which the growth company may meet.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In view of the fact that the committee bill has increased the income-tax rate for corporations, the normal and surtax, to 47 percent instead of 45——

Mr. GEORGE. Only the surtax. We do not impose any increase on the normal.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The surtax, yes, so that the total rate goes as high as 47 percent.

Mr. GEORGE. That is correct.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It has seemed to me that that might result and probably would result in penalizing small corporations, to the great advantage of the huge growing corporations. For example, a corporation with a total income, let us say, of $100,000, would be embraced within the 47 percent rate, would it not?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, that is true, because it would get into the surtax bracket.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. But under this amendment which affects growth corporations, a growth corporation might have a total income of $500,000 or more, and yet it would have a special exemption which would not go to the normal corporation or firm. Am I correct about that?

Mr. GEORGE. The amendment does not give an exemption.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. But it provides this alternative method.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; but it is solely for the purpose of giving them a base. It does not exempt them from the excess-profits tax at all.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. But it gives them a higher base than they otherwise would have.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; because otherwise many of them would not have a base, although some would.

We believe this formula would exclude those heavily invested firms which may be said in all reason not to be entitled to any special consideration or treatment. This amendment is offered for the purpose of being taken to conference, because the provision now in the bill is so restricted as to exclude 61 percent of the television industry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the proper place in the bill it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

(h) Change in operations and management:

In the case of any two or more corporations who consolidated their operational activities or a substantial portion thereof, after December 31, 1946, and prior to July 1, 1950, whether or not the corporations were also merged and by reason of such consolidation additional net income is produced, then in each taxable year after such consolidation the additional net income of each such corporation, where such additional income results by reason of such consolidation and is not already reflected in the base period earnings, shall be added to the average base period net income of each corporation and shall operate as an additional credit to such taxpayer in computing its liability for excess-profits tax under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. CAPEHART. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the able Senator from Georgia that he take the amendment to conference; and if the amendment can be worked in the bill, as I believe it can, I would ask that that be done.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I shall be glad to agree, to take the amendment to conference, with the understanding that if it does not fit into the bill properly, we shall be free to eliminate it.

This particular matter was studied by the committee. The committee did not see fit to include it. Of course, it does possess certain merit.

However, if it is understood that the amendment is taken for conference purposes, I shall be very glad, so far as I am concerned, to have it approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 45, after line 17, it is proposed to insert the following:

(G) By computing—

(i) in the manner provided by subparagraph (E), the excess profits net income for each of the 6 months in the period beginning July 1, 1948, and ending December 31, 1948, and for each of the 6 months in the period beginning January 1, 1950, and ending June 30, 1950, and

(ii) the aggregate of the excess profits net income for each of the 12 months referred to in clause (i).

In line 20, it is proposed to strike out "or (F)" and insert in lieu thereof "(F), or (G) (ii)."

And on page 44, in line 17, before the word "the", it is proposed to insert "and subparagraph (G)."

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I have discussed the amendment with the chairman of the committee, as well as with other members of the committee and with members of the staff.

Section 435 (e) of the bill is intended to grant relief to companies with a record of major growth during the latter part of the base period and early in 1950. Companies which meet the stringent qualifications imposed under this section will be permitted to compute their credit by using 50 percent of the 1949 earnings plus 40 percent of the 1950 earnings.

In a very few cases, true growth companies otherwise meeting these severe qualifications will be denied relief due to strikes, fires, and so forth, which abnormally depressed their 1949 earnings.

To relieve the severe hardship which would otherwise be suffered by these companies, I am offering this amendment to permit such taxpayers to use 50 percent of their earnings for the year 1948 in lieu of their abnormally low earnings for 1949.

This further relief provision will have a negligible effect, I believe, upon the revenue, since it will be a rare and aggravated case where a company otherwise qualifying as a "growth company" will have earnings in 1948 greater than in 1949.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MYERS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I offer a series of technical amendments relating to the growth formula, which have been prepared by the staff. I ask that they be approved en bloc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 227, it is proposed to strike out lines 10 and 11, and insert the following: "tion created incident to such transaction) had commenced business prior to the beginning of its base period (determined without reference to section 461 (d)) and met the requirements of section 435 (e) (1) (A) (i):."

On page 228, in line 15, it is proposed to strike out "(1) (B)" and insert "(1) (A) (i)."

On page 228, in line 18, it is proposed to strike out "'435 (e) (1) (B)", and insert "435 (e) (1) (A) (i)."

On page 229, it is proposed to strike out lines 1 and 2 and insert "one or more component corporation, had commenced business prior to the beginning of its base period (determined without reference to section 461 (d)) and met the requirements of section 435 (e) (1) (a) (i)."

On page 230, it is proposed to strike out lines 11 and 12, and insert the following: "transaction, had commenced business prior to the beginning of its base period (determined without reference to section 461 (d)) and met the requirements of section 435 (e) (1) (A) (i), the acquiring corporation, if it de-."

On page 231, in line 6, it is proposed to strike out "435 (e) (1) (B)" and insert "435 (e) (1) (A) (i)."

On page 231, in line 11, it is proposed to strike out "(e) (1) (B)" and insert "(e) (1) (A) (i)."

On page 231, after line 11, it is proposed to insert:

(3) Where any corporation, a party to a transaction described in section 461 (a), either was entitled at the time of the transaction to determine its average base period net income under section 435 (e) by reason of its having met the requirements of sections 435 (e) (1) (A) and (D) or, where the transaction occurred prior to July 1, 1950, had commenced business prior to the beginning of its base period (determined without reference to section 461 (d)) and was furnishing at the time of the transaction a product of the type described in section 435 (e) (1) (B) (ii), the acquiring corporation shall be entitled to determine its average base period net income under section 435 (e) as provided in this subsection, disregarding, for purposes of this paragraph, the next to the last sentence of paragraph (1) (A) (ii) and the last sentence of paragraph (2), and substituting, for purposes of this paragraph, for the reference to the requirements of section 435 (e) (1) (A) (i), wherever it appears in paragraphs (1) and (2), a reference to the requirements of section 435 (e) (1) (B) as set forth in this paragraph, and for the words "gross receipts", wherever they appear in paragraphs (1) and (2), the words "net sales."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the several amendments en bloc? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, the amendments are considered and agreed to en bloc.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have read.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to offer one more clerical amendment?

Mr. DWORSHAK. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a clerical amendment, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 255, line 13, it is proposed to strike out "prior to" and insert "on or before."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I ask that my amendment be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 148, line 21, after the word "molybdenum", it is proposed to insert "beryllium."

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, I am sure the committee will accept this amendment. It merely includes beryllium among the strategic minerals. I have checked with the Bureau of Mines, and it has pointed out that this is an alloy used with steel and copper in connection with the production of jet planes and munitions. I am sure that there can be no valid objection to the inclusion of beryllium among the strategic minerals.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the committee will offer no objection, subject to the same statement I have heretofore made, that if it should appear that any of these metals or minerals ought not to be included, we shall then be at liberty to use our best judgment.

Mr. DWORSHAK. That is satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK] is agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 163, following line 19, it is proposed to add a new paragraph, as follows:

9 (A). Alternative computations: In any case in which more than one mineral property is owned or operated by a lessor or a producer as defined in (a) (1) of this section, such lessor or producer may treat the mineral properties as one property for purposes of computing exempt excess output under this section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

TOO MILD A TAX BILL

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I think that all the committee amendments have been presented. I want to make a few brief remarks about the pending bill. In the first place, I wish to express my personal appreciation to the Finance Committee for having reported an excess-profits-tax bill. It is not the sort of bill I was advocating during the session of the Congress in September, but it is an excess-profits-tax bill, and it complies with the provision which was contained in the tax bill which was passed—that at the adjourned session of the Congress an excess-profits-tax bill would be presented. It is a mild bill. It does not raise enough revenue, but it is an excess-profits-tax bill.

This morning the Committee on Appropriations completed its consideration of the supplemental defense appropriation bill, containing approximately $20,000,000,000 of new funds, to be expended principally for the defense of the United States. Added to the $17,000,000,000 appropriation bill passed last fall, this will make a total of $37,000,000,000 to be spent for defense.

There was evidence before the committee which showed that the increases in the prices of commodities which go into defense since immediately before the outbreak of the Korean war have taken a very severe bite out of every defense dollar. It is not too much to say that within the past 6 months the increase in price of the materials we are purchasing for national defense has been so great as to amount to approximately $3,000,000,000. In other words, it will cost $3,000,000,000 more now to buy commodities for defense than it would have cost in April or May of this year. Inflation is undermining our ability to defend the Nation.

In order that it may be understood just what $3,000,000,000 would do, I have had a computation made with respect to the cost of equipping infantry divisions and purchasing bombers and jet fighters. The fact is that the $3,000,000,000 which we have lost by inflation since April 1950 would be sufficient to outfit and equip 10 infantry divisions. It would provide 300 B–36 bombers and 2,250 F-jet fighters for the protection of the United States and the defense of the principles for which it stands.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. BREWSTER. Does that mean alternatively, or does it mean that it would cover all items? It was not clear to me.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No—all the defense items I have mentioned.

Mr. BREWSTER. The sum the Senator has mentioned would provide all those items. Is that correct?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The $3,000,000,000 would provide all those items.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I thought it costs $400,000,000 to equip one division alone; so I would have supposed that the estimate of $3,000,000,000 for the cost of equipping 10 divisions would be a little low.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Of course, these figures may be subject to alteration. I had the computation made. I did not make it myself. I am sure, however, that it is not too inaccurate and correctly portrays the losses we are suffering from inflation.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I have heard that the cost of equipping an infantry division at the time of the outbreak of the Korean war was $75,000,000, and that it is now $81,000,000; and, in addition to the items which the Senator has mentioned, there was a statement to the effect that the sum indicated by the Senator would furnish tanks for 10 armored divisions. If we were to lose from our military power 10 infantry divisions, the tanks of 10 armored divisions, and the number of bombers the Senator suggested the people of America would be greatly shocked, and then would figure that we were in a very bad situation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania, whose long military experience adds very much to the significance of his words. My purpose was to compare the situation in which we find ourselves with respect to appropriations with the situation which exists with respect to taxes. An examination of the House report will show that the purpose of the House committee was to make this tax bill a softer bill than the excess-profits-tax bill for World War II. We seem to be excessively tender toward profits. The report of the Senate Finance Committee, on page 8, contains a table which shows the rates of return on equity capital which are allowed in this bill, as compared with the rates which were allowed in World War II. I ask that the table be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Equity capital, retained earnings, and borrowed capital [1] rate brackets	Rates under Finance Committee bill	Rates under World War II law
(In millions)
Under $5	12 percent	8 percent.
$5 to $10	10 percent	6 percent.
Over $10	8 percent	5 percent.

[1] Under the World War II statute the capital in each bracket included only one-half of the borrowed capital.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Under the heading "Equity capital retained earnings, and borrowed capital rate brackets," according to the Finance Committee bill, such capital under $5,000,000 will be allowed a rate of 12 percent. In the World War II tax law, the allowed rate was only 8 percent. Where the equity capital amounts to more than $5,000,000 and less than $10,000,000, the rate in this bill is 10 percent; the rate under the World War II law was 6 percent. Where the equity capital amounts to more than $10,000,000, which includes all the giant corporations, the pending bill allows a rate of 8 percent, as compared with 5 percent under the World War II law.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I shall yield in a moment. What that means, of course, is that we are saying that the tax-paying corporation will not begin to pay excess-profits taxes under this bill, if it chooses the invested capital base, until it has earned—if it is one of the giants—with more than $10,000,000 invested, 8 percent; if its invested capital is between $5,000,000 and $10,000,000, it will not begin to pay excess-profits taxes until it has earned 10 percent; and if it is under $5,000,000, until it has earned 12 percent.

Believe it or not, however, this bill permits borrowed capital to be computed in the invested capital base. In the World War II law only one-half of borrowed capital could be added to the invested capital base. Now we allow it all. Thus with interest rates low a corporation could reduce its tax liability under this excess-profits bill by borrowing at low rates money it did not need so as to raise its credit. We are tender indeed toward profits.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I should like to point out, however, that as to the 8 percent, the taxpayer would pay taxes under the general corporation tax, so he would not keep 8 percent; he would keep approximately only 4½ percent.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. What the Senator says may be correct. I am pointing out that a device is offered to reduce excess-profits-tax liability.

The Finance Committee bill has increased the surtax rate over the amount applicable in the years from 1945 to 1947. But, in addition to that, this bill reduces the over-all ceiling from 67 percent, as provided in the House bill, to 60 percent as provided in this bill. That over-all ceiling may be briefly explained in this way: The ceiling of 67 percent provided by the House bill had the effect of providing that no matter how great the profits were, no corporation would pay excess-profit taxes which, when added to the normal tax and the surtax of 47 percent, would exceed 60 percent on the whole. So that means that we are levying a surtax upon corporations which are not earning the high profits and excess-profits tax is intended to reach of an increased rate which raises normal and surtax to a maximum of 47 percent and we are saying, in effect, that the excess-profits tax shall cover only the 13 percent between 47 and 60 percent.

Mr. TAFT. We applied the 60-percent rate to the largest corporations in the country, such as General Motors, du Pont, and United States Steel. The 60-percent limit will not save them 1 percent on the very large earnings which they have enjoyed in 1950. With any kind of regulation they will not enjoy much greater amounts in 1951. So, according to the information given to the committee, it is to the advantage of the intermediate and smaller companies. It will in no way, as we see it, assist the large corporations, or reduce their taxes.

SMALL CORPORATIONS PENALIZED

Mr. O'MAHONEY. When we increased the normal and surtax maximum to 47 percent, when we place this limit on all corporations, and when we then reduce the excess-profits-tax ceiling from 67 percent in the House bill to 60 percent, we are necessarily favoring the corporations with high incomes, with high profits, with excess profits. At the same time we are penalizing the small corporations which are not enjoying such high profits because we are shifting the burden from the giants to the smaller corporations.

We have employed the progressive-tax idea so far as individuals are concerned, but for some reason or other, which has never been clear to me, in the drafting of tax laws we have chosen not to apply the progressive theory to the taxation of corporate income. For example, a corporation with an income of, let us say, $100,000, will pay the normal and surtax rate of approximately 45 percent under the present law. An individual with an income of $100,000, on the other hand, will pay at a rate in excess of that. So it goes. The individual tax rate will go as high as 85 percent, but the corporate tax rate, under this bill, will never go higher than 60 percent because of these provisions. That system favors the existing big corporation and tends to dry up investment capital for new enterprise.

Mr. President, the President sent to the Congress a request for an excess-profits-tax bill which would raise $4,000,000,000. The House committee reported a bill which was a billion dollars under that amount, namely, approximately $3,000,0000,000. The Finance Committee has reported a bill which has added $200,000,000, as I understand the report. This bill is estimated to produce revenue amounting tio $3,200,000,000.

I cannot fail to think corporate management of the United States must feel that this is not a heavy bill, because ever since it became clear what the nature of this measure would be, prices in the stock market have been going up for the big corporations which are expected to receive war contracts. The stock market knows that we are tender toward profits.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is the Senator from Wyoming aware of the fact that what he has said is particularly true in connection with mining companies?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I was not aware of that, but I acknowledge that it may be a fact in some cases. They ought to pay their share.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I agree with the Senator. I want to invite attention to the fact that their exemption was brought about with the Senator's consent and approval, and I disapproved.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The tax bill was designed to exempt products necessary to defense.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would the Senator agree with me that his proposal is against the recommendations of the President, who has consistently and repeatedly recommended that we tax mining companies to a greater extent?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think there is a distinction there that the Senator overlooks. The Senator will probably cause me to branch off into what I consider to be an irrelevant discussion. As the Senator from Ohio said a while ago when he was commenting on the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Colorado, it would be perfectly absurd for the Government, under the Defense Production Act, to pay subsidies to promote the production of minerals which are needed for defense purposes and, at the same time, tax those companies on the subsidies provided by the Government. I was not consulted in the preparation of that amendment. I did however urge the stimulation of domestic mineral production.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator agree with me that the same statement could also be made with respect to farmers and to companies manufacturing airplanes or anything else?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No; I do not think so.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. MILLIKIN. With reference to the $4,000,000,000 recommended, at the time the recommendation was made it was thought that that sum would balance the budget for the present fiscal year. So it had some sort of relevancy to the particular revenue problem facing the country at that time. An examination quickly developed that it would not balance the budget, and it has no relation whatever, in terms of dollars, to the deficit next year. So that $4,000,000,000 lost its sanctity. In view of the fact that there is going to be an enormous increase in taxes, I do not think the $4,000,000,000 figure has its original unimpeachable character.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that it never had any unimpeachable character, in my mind. I thought it was far too low. It never occurred to me that $4,000,000,000 would balance the budget. I am now quite sure that $3,200,000,00 will not go anywhere near balancing the budget. This is not a pay-as-you-go tax bill.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I think that next year the amount realized will probably be from $4,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000. But if the Senator from Wyoming is worried about the difference between $3,200,000,000 and $4,000,000,000, I think he may be comforted by realizing that we are going to raise all taxes.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am happy to hear the Senator say that. I know the Senator redeems his promises, and that means that the Senator from Colorado in the next session of Congres will be working for a higher level of taxes.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Yes.

Mr. MILLIKIN. I will not do that with joy, but through necessity.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. None of us will do it with joy, of course. What I am trying to point out is the impelling necessity of levying a high rate of taxes, particularly on high profits. No one may hope to make a profit out of the defense program. If we are drawn into another war, no one may expect to make any profit out of that. There can be no doubt that the dictators in the Kremlin are depending upon our failure realistically to take free money out of the market and prevent inflation as their last weapon with which to destroy us. Inflation is the enemy within the gate and we are not coming to grips with it.

Mr. DWORSHAK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. DWORSHAK. I am sure that the Senator from Wyoming does not want the recent colloquy between himself and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WILLIAMS] to leave the erroneous impression that the mining companies which mine strategic minerals want to be permitted to profiteer in this great hour of emergency. I should like to point out that the exemptions of strategic minerals include various minerals which are in short supply, and many of which are being imported into this country. Certainly it would be virtual confiscation to induce the domestic mining industry to produce in excess of normal requirements, and at the same time have the Government step in through any kind of tax and take virtually all the profits or proceeds from the mining of such minerals. In the mining industry capital investment is reflected in deposits of minerals. When they are exhausted the result is not comparable to a profit, but rather to a depletion of capital investment. The mining industry wants to cooperate in every way possible in this emergency.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am grateful to the Senator for his statement. I wish to add only that it has been the policy of Congress for many years now to stockpile strategic and critical materials. It was recognized that in some instances we do not ourselves produce the strategic and critical materials which are necessary in war. Therefore, we authorized the accumulation of a stockpile, and we have been buying these materials. In the act which authorized the stockpiling we provided specific authority to stimulate the production of these materials at home, so that we would not be dependent upon foreign sources of supply. I think that is a sound program.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I have enjoyed the discussion of the Senator from Wyoming. I am sure that I would agree with him on a great many points which he has made if I understood the intricacies of our tax structure as well as the Senator from Wyoming understands them. However, I have yet failed to get the point of his discourse. Does the Senator advocate a vote against the bill?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Oh, no.

Mr. AIKEN. Is the bill so inadequate that we should vote against it?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. No. The bill is inadequate, but it is probably all we can get now.

Mr. AIKEN. I ask the question because if there is a roll call, I shall be obliged to vote first, and I should like to have the guidance of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I hope the Senator from Vermont will vote for the bill. Certainly I shall vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. AIKEN. That is what I wanted to find out.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I am aware of the fact that members of the Committee on Finance have said privately what the Senator from Colorado has stated, that next year the committee will come in with another tax bill, and I want that tax bill to be realistic, as this tax bill is unrealistic. However, half a loaf is better than no bread. I have remembered enough of my New England upbringing not to forget that maxim. Therefore, I shall take the bill rather than take no bill, because Congress will adjourn very soon. I shall do this although this bill is far less than half a loaf.

Mr. AIKEN. I thank the Senator from Wyoming, and I shall vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I do not desire unduly to take the time of the Senate in discussing this subject. My purpose, as I have stated to the Senator from Vermont, is to get my statement into the RECORD. The bill does not produce the amount of revenue the Government should have. There are many loopholes in the bill. I hope that when in the next session of Congress we undertake to write a tax bill consideration will be given not only to the points which I have raised but also to other points which an examination of the bill will, I am sure, disclose should be adequately covered.

The principle of an excess-profits tax is here again recognized although it is far weaker than it ought to be, far weaker than the World War II excess-profits-tax law. It has been given to us in the face of the most bitter, most determined fight ever made to kill the principle of a tax on high profits. That fight failed. It gives us reason to hope that the new Congress will give us a tax bill that will help stop inflation, a tax bill that will help save the system of private property.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HENDRICKSON], who was called from the floor, has asked me to offer an amendment, to which there is no objection. The amendment would include certain other utilities, one of which had been omitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 143, line 14, it is proposed to strike out the words "or water, or" and to insert in lieu thereof "water, or sewerage disposal services, or."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. WHERRY. I should like to ask a question or two with reference to former section 722. I notice on page 24 of the report that under the caption "Other types of abnormalities in the base period" certain relief is given, which is also true of subparagraph (iii) on page 22 of the report, which deals with increase in capacity during the base period. I do not know in how many other places in the bill relief is given similar to relief under section 722. I assume all such relief refers to the future. I am wondering whether anything has been done with respect to giving retroactive help in hardship cases, such as I brought to the attention of the distinguished Senator from Georgia, growing out of situations which occurred during World War II relative to the base period, depressed industries, and other abnormalities.

Mr. GEORGE. There is nothing in the bill which gives relief to any hardship cases retroactively. The purpose of providing formulas for increased capacity, new corporations, depressed industries, abnormalities, and so forth, was to provide automatic relief rather than the relief which taxpayers were not able to get under section 722, at least as it was administered.

Mr. WHERRY. I deeply appreciate the remarks of the Senator. There is nothing by way of retroactive relief?

Mr. GEORGE. Nothing retroactively.

Mr. WHERRY. Does the Senator feel that in a tax bill next year there may be something done with reference to section 722? The Senator well knows that there are companies in my section of the country which have had no relief by taking their cases through proper channels. I think they are working for some retroactive legislative relief. Because automatic relief is being given to abnormalities in the future, I am wondering whether anything could be done in the next session with reference to retroactive relief.

Mr. GEORGE. I would not be able to say, of course. The Treasury has indicated that we shall have a tax bill, and presumably the House will begin work upon another tax bill at an early date. Generally proper treatment is given to real hardship cases, and oftentimes retroactively. I can only say to the Senator that I believe that we shall deal with these matters just as we ordinarily do in a general tax revision, when we can get to them and have an opportunity to deal with them. I should like to be able to give the Senator some assurance, and I should be glad to do so if I could, but I cannot give him any more definite assurance than I have given.

Mr. WHERRY. I appreciate the assurance which the Senator has given. I have spoken to him on more than one occasion.

Mr. GEORGE. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. Some relief was anticipated. Up until now it has not been given. The procedure has practically shut out any relief in the majority of cases.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is correct. The program of relief has somewhat broken down. However, that section is not repealed.

Mr. WHERRY. No.

Mr. GEORGE. It is still open, and we are still functioning under it.

Mr. WHERRY. There is no repeal of whatever provisions there are relative to hardship cases retroactively.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. Those provisions remain in full force and effect.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true. This bill, however, is not made retroactive.

Mr. President, I wish to add merely one word. At the beginning of my statement, I pointed out that at the present time the total tax take from individuals now amounts to $22,000,000,000, and that the total tax take from corporations, by the passage of this bill, will have reached the high level of more than $19,000,000,000. If the increase in corporate income continues through 1951 at the present trend, the total tax take from corporations will exceed the present tax take from individuals, and this bill will produce between $4,000,000,000 and $5,000,000,000 if the normal increase, the trends of which are now evident and measurable, extends through 1951. The tax on corporations is extremely high, even if it is taken out of some $40,000,000,000 of income, when we consider that forty-odd billion dollars as against the total income of all individuals in the United States.

Complaint was made by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] because of a 60-percent over-all limitation. Let me remind him that with a 95-percent rate in World War II the ceiling was fixed at 72 percent after taking into account the postwar credit.

Mr. FLANDERS. Mr. President, we have before us an excess profits tax bill which is generally expected to pass substantially as presented. This bill is commonly considered by sensible people to be better than the House bill. I beg to differ with this statement. It is merely less bad than the House bill.

"Excess profits tax" is one of those bright, shining, liberal tags which appeals to the ordinary voter and to the voter-conscious legislator. Every legislator should be voter conscious, but he must be something more. I think all of us would agree that our constituents expect us to do something more than take a real or imaginary referendum of their judgment on any given subject at any given time and govern our voting thereby. I am sure, Mr. President, that my own constituents feel that they have put me in a position where I am given some time for study and analysis, and they expect an exercise of judgment on my part. They also retain the right of criticism and of demanding explanations. Finally, they reserve the right to retire me at the end of my term if my voting and my explanations for my votes are not satisfactory to them.

Assuming that some thought and analysis is required of me by my constituents and that I am not to be a voting machine manipulated by levers, I feel it my duty to do something more than read the tag on this package. The tag says, "Excess profits tax." What is in the package?

Mr. President, there are in the package administrative difficulties and injustices. Others have detailed or will detail some of these. I will refer to them only briefly. What I do wish to say first is that you cannot segregate the excess profits of war production from peacetime profits in a time of all-out preparation for war such as we are entering. Any increase in profits as a result of our expansion of war production is an excess profit, whether it comes at first hand and to a contractor of war matériel or whether it comes at third or fourth hand to industries and business not directly connected with the war effort. There is no administrative procedure which the mind of man can devise which will separate the war profits from the peacetime profits.

There are likewise war losses. Profits of some businesses are going to be very greatly decreased by the war effort. These unfortunate businesses may properly seek to sustain their falling markets by getting war contracts suited to their equipment and the skill of their personnel. But their losses are war losses.

In view of these over-all considerations the real policy for all-out production is to tax profits wherever found. The corporation tax is the answer to the problem of corporate war profits.

The alternative for excessive profits which this tax was designed to remedy, is to be found in renegotiation. In the process of renegotiation special conditions are always, and of necessity, taken into account as they cannot be in general legislation. The combination of high corporate taxes and renegotiation cover all the necessities for profit control and high tax revenue under war conditions.

There is every expectation that this bill will pass the Senate substantially as is. I am not going to delay its progress by amendments at this time. However, I earnestly suggest to the Finance Committee that it replace this bill with one providing a corporate tax of 60 percent in place of the 45 percent of the House measure and the 47 percent of the Senate measure. This will, according to the best estimate I can get, produce some $7,000,000,000 of increased income, $3,000,000,000 or $4,000,000,000 more than does the bill under consideration. My own opposition to the excess profits tax is not that it raises too much money. I am urging that a general corporation tax of 60 percent be established at the earliest possible time in the session of the Eighty-second Congress, eliminating completely the misbegotten excess profits tax.

A couple of the inequities require brief comment. One of them is in provisions for hardship cases. The provisions in the Senate bill for depressed industries should be defined in more specific terms as relating to industries which exhaust their demand in wartime instead of damming it up. A Treasury classification is not a valid criterion for this purpose. As an example, automobiles and consumer goods in general had their demands dammed up by war controls. As further examples, shipbuilding, the airplane industry, and machine tools had their demand exhausted by wartime conditions. This should be the criterion for relief.

I know something of each of these three industries but know the machine-tool industry most intimately, having been engaged in it for 50 years until I came to the Senate. The bill appears to lump it with general machinery. It should not be so lumped. For instance, under general machinery could come printing machinery and textile machinery which had a postwar boom. Demand had been dammed up. Machine tools had a postwar slump. Peacetime demand had been destroyed.

I do not need to call attention to the inflationary effect of unwarranted expenses which follow in the wake of excess profits. That is sufficiently well known, but has not deterred the preparation and presentation of this bill. I wish to mention briefly what others have criticized, and that is its effects on small business.

It sometimes seems as though every time we pass a bill with a liberal tag and without examining the package, we get another blow at small business. That was the case with the recently passed H. R. 2734, putting in question the acquisition of assets. The small-business man who wishes to dispose of his property is now sure of no process except the kind of a piecemeal liquidation that goes with bankruptcy. His reasons for wishing to sell may be perfectly good. He or his partners may be growing old without heirs coming along to take over. Or it may be the settlement of an estate in the event of death. The value of the estate may be tremendously depreciated by this law, to the misfortune of the widow and the orphan.

But that is an aside. What I am saying in this case is that while the impossible endeavor is made to protect the interests of the small business such business is sure to get it in the neck. It will, among other things, run up against the advantage which big business will have in its institutional advertising which will be warranted from the business standpoint when the Government pays most of the bill. It furthermore will get it in the neck because the big company can fight it case through. The little business cannot afford the high cost of legal talent and the executive attention.

I might go further, but these examples will do.

In view of these considerations I shall vote against this tax bill if I am able to be in the Senate when it comes to a vote. And I hereby ask that my name be reported against it if I am compelled to be absent, as may be the case.

I do ask that we have a much higher regular corporate tax of general application. I have suggested 60 percent. If we do that, and if we raise personal-income taxes as well, we shall be fighting the causes of inflation instead of trying merely to control the symptoms as we do under the measures we have voted for wage and price control. Let us be honest in our efforts to save the American citizen from the forces of inflation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, first I should like to congratulate the Committee on Finance for reporting to the Senate an excess profits tax bill. We were somewhat dubious last fall as to whether or not we would have an excess profits tax bill, and I am glad the committee has brought this measure before the Senate.

I also desire to congratulate the committee on dating back the effective period at which the new tax rates will take effect to the first of July instead of to the first of October, as might have been possible under the joint resolution adopted by the Senate and House last September.

I should like to emphasize the fact that we need tremendous amounts of revenue. When we passed the ordinary budget last summer there was an indicated deficit of approximately $3,000,000,000. That may have been made good by the greater prosperity of the country and the increase in revenue since then, but in September, as we are all aware, we passed the first supplemental appropriations bill, calling for $17,000,000,000, nearly all of it for war purposes. Furthermore, as the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] has stated, the Appropriations Committee now has under consideration, and I believe will report tomorrow, the second urgent deficiency bill, which, as he stated, will provide appropriations of $18,000,000,000 more. We will therefore be appropriating—and I am very glad we are doing so—$35,000,000,000 more for military purposes above and beyond the ordinary budget of some $41,000,000,000 which we passed last summer, and which included in it an item of about $13,500,000,000 for military appropriations for our own forces, plus other appropriations for defense such as atomic energy.

Mr. President, it is quite possible that we may not spend within the fiscal year 1950–51 all of this extra $35,000,000,000 which we will appropriate during the current year. I think it is probable that we will not spend all of it. But I believe it will be necessary for us to spend at a greater rate than now seems to be contemplated if we are to be adequately prepared for the military emergency which now confronts us.

MILITARY CRISIS REQUIRES GREATLY INCREASED REVENUES

We are in a serious military crisis and we need a much larger Army, a much larger Navy, a much larger Air Force, and time will not work with us unless we use every minute of it to become prepared to the fullest possible extent. I think, therefore, our military and defense authorities should not feel that they should restrict their efforts during the coming months in order to spend as little as possible. The aim should be to bring about the maximum amount of military preparation, and we can certainly expect that a very large amount of this $35,000,000,000 will be spent during the coming 6 months. As we move into the fiscal year 1951–52 we will be spending at the very least $35,000,000,000 plus $15,000,000,000 or a total of $50,000,000,000 for national defense. The sum total for national defense will probably be greatly in excess of that figure.

Mr. President, that is on the expenditures side. What provision are we making on the revenue side for these tremendous outlays? Last September we passed a revenue bill which was estimated to yield approximately four and a half billion dollars a year when it came into full operation. Today we have submitted to us an excess profits tax bill yielding in this year an annual rate of three and two-tenths billion dollars, and yielding from four to five billion dollars a year when in full operation. If we estimate the future yield of this bill at $4,000,000,000 that, added to the four-and a half billion dollars provided by the tax bill of last September makes a total of eight and one-half billion dollars. I doubt if these two bills combined will yield more than from nine to nine and one-half billion dollars as compared with the additional $35,000,000,000 which we are pledging ourselves by appropriations. In other words we are providing for only about one-quarter of the added military costs by our two tax bills.

INFLATIONARY DANGERS OF INADEQUATE TAXATION

Mr. President, what will happen if we do not tax at a greater rate? It is perfectly obvious what will happen. The Government will be forced to borrow. We hope that the American public will buy bonds out of current income, out of savings resulting from reduced expenditures for consumption. But we know as a matter of fact that, if we have to raise from twenty-five to twenty-seven billion dollars by loans, the private savings of individuals will not be sufficient to meet this amount.

As a result, unless we raise more revenue, we will have to borrow from the banks, and the Treasury will be compelled to go to the banks and tell them that they should subscribe a given percentage of their capital assets in the form of loans to the Government. The banks will do this, but how will they do it? They will do it by setting up checking accounts to these amounts, against which the Government can draw. The banks will create, therefore, check-book money, added bank credit against which the Government will draw to pay for the materials and services which it utilizes in the war.

In other words, the sum total of money which is offered for goods will increase relatively, and the inevitable result will be a rise in the price level and inflation. We can stave that off partially, for a time by a system of price and wage controls, but it will only be postponing or alleviating the increases in prices unless we have an all-out system and wage controls. Even then, controls will attack only the effects of inflation and not the cause itself. Even if we have controls, we must still attack the root of inflation by higher taxes so that we can avoid borrowing from the banks.

So it seems to me that the most important thing this body can do at the present time is to pass a strong tax bill which will raise the maximum amount of revenue. To fail to do so is to force the Government to borrow, to force the banks to create credit, and to force up the price level. We cannot disavow responsibility for what follows, if we do not try to get the maximum amount of revenue at this time.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I have great respect for the Senator from Ohio, but I am speaking without a prepared manuscript, and I should like to finish my remarks. Then I shall be very glad to yield to the Senator from Ohio. I am afraid that if his siren song sounds across the Chamber, I shall forget some of my points and be diverted. [Laughter.] Therefore, like Ulysses, I must lash myself to the mast until I have finished.

Mr. President, I know it is very difficult to enact a very severe tax bill. The people who are to pay the increased taxes always appear and protest. The general public is not represented to the same degree; the general public does not have its personal representatives in Washington, and its voice cannot be heard. It is up to us to make it heard.

However, the ultimate consequences go further. It is hard to tax; it is unpopular to tax. It is easy to postpone the evil day. But whatever the political consequences to us may be—and they may be severe in the case of those who work for a rigid tax bill—certainly they are less important than the consequences to our country if we fail to tax as rigidly as we should.

Certainly I do not wish to criticize the Finance Committee, which is composed of eminent gentlemen, patriotic gentlemen, able gentlemen. Anything I say certainly should not be interpreted in the slightest sense as a criticism of their motives. I merely say that bills which are supposed to be helpful to some elements of society frequently are hurtful to society as a whole. It is to this larger aspect that I should like to speak.

There are at least two points in the bill about which I am very dubious, and there is a third point about which I should like to ask some questions.

REDUCED MAXIMUM EFFECTIVE RATE WILL COST US $250,000,000

The first point about which I am dubious is the proposed reduction of the maximum effective rate of taxation. Under the provisions of the bill as passed by the House this maximum effective rate is 67 percent. This would be reduced to 60 percent by the Senate committee bill. I have had some computations made on that point. It seems clear that the Senate committee amendment will result in a loss to the Government of approximately $250,000,000 of revenue per annum, perhaps much more.

We remember that in World War II the maximum rate of taxation was 72 percent. Now it is proposed that we reduce that rate to 60 percent, as compared with the rate applied during World War II, and reduce it 7 percentage points below the maximum rate provided by the House.

There will be some interesting consequences of that action. Not only will there be a loss of revenue, but such a change will mean that the concerns which profit most from the war activity, and whose earnings rise very greatly, will be exempted to the degree by which the reduction in the maximum rate can be imposed. I think we should take that point very much into consideration.

It is my present intention to offer an amendment which will increase the maximum rate of taxation from 60 to 70 percent. According to my estimates, that increased rate will yield approximately $350,000,000 more revenue than will the maximum rate provided by the committee.

TREATMENT ACCORDED TO PROFITS MADE ON BORROWED CAPITAL

There is a second part of the committee bill about which I am very dubious. In fact, I think this portion of the committee bill would be a mistake and that we should retain the House provision. This is the provision for the treatment of profits made on borrowed capital. The bill as passed by the House provided that the interest on borrowed capital—in other words, the interest on bonds or on borrowings from banks—would be deducted from the gross profits before arriving at taxable net profits, so that the excess-profits rate would be figured on the net profits minus the interest; and then, to make an allowance for the risk on indebtedness, the net credit would be equal to one-third of the interest cost. That is, the gross credit is one and one-third times the interest cost, but after deduction of bond interest, the net credit is one-third interest cost. This is exempted from excess-profits tax.

The bill now before us, as reported by our committee, provides that there shall be an average, overall rate of return on all capital, computed not merely on equity capital, but also on borrowed capital. This makes a very real difference, because we well know that the interest rate on borrowed capital is appreciably below what the average overall rate of return will be under the second method of computing excess profits.

I hold in my hand the most recent bulletin—for November 1950—of the Federal Reserve Board. On page 1506 we find stated the average yield on corporation bonds. The statement shows that in the last week of October, the average rate of return on high-grade corporate bonds was as follows: 2.67 percent on Aaa bonds; 2.72 percent on Aa bonds; 2.91 percent on A bonds; and 3.22 percent on Baa bonds.

Mr. President, what is the meaning of this provision? The meaning is that under the second method of computation this bill provides an average rate of return, on borrowed capital as well as equity capital, of 12 percent for corporations with earnings under $5,000,000, 10 percent on earnings of corporations from $5,000,000 to $10,000,000, and 8 percent on earnings of corporations over $10,000,000.

Suppose a concern is worth $10,000,000, and suppose half of its capital is provided by means of the sale of bonds and half through equity capital. Under this provision that corporation will be allowed 11 percent on the entire $10,000,000, or approximately $1,100,000, before the computation of excess profits begins.

Under the provision of the bill as passed by the House, if the corporation borrowed on its bonds at 3 percent it would be allowed the actual interest paid on the bonds—in other words, 3 percent on $5,000,000, or $150,000—plus one-third, or $200,000.

Therefore we see that the excess earnings—the earnings in excess of the cost on the bonds—can therefore be transferred to the owners of the equity under the provisions of the committee bill, so that their real earnings will be appreciably in excess of the 10 percent which is allowed.

TREATMENT ACCORDED BORROWED CAPITAL ILLUSTRATED

I have worked out an illustration on that point which I should like to give: Assume that a corporation has a total capitalization of $10,000,000, consisting of $5,000,000 equity and $5,000,000 borrowed capital, with interest at 3 percent. Under the provisions of the bill as passed by the House the net excess-profits credit would be equal to $600,000, plus one-third of the interest cost—$50,000—or a total of $650,000. Under the bill as now proposed to be revised, the net credit would be equal to $950,000, or an increase of almost 50 percent over the House bill.

Now, note what happens to the earnings of the stockholders. Taking into account this $950,000 before excess-profit taxes means that the stockholders of the corporation can earn 19 percent on their investment of $5,000,000 before they are subject to excess-profits tax; that is, there is $950,000 which they earn before the excess-profits tax begins, compared with the 13 percent which was allowed under the House bill. The result of the Senate provision is to give a much greater rate of return to those concerns which have appreciable amounts of bonded indebtedness than is given to concerns which do not have much bonded indebtedness. Therefore, this provision will tend to favor the highly capitalized companies, the large companies which have been able to float bonds, who will only pay for these bonds at the rate of 3 percent interest, but who are given an earning rate of return of from 8 to 10 percent. The difference between that 3 percent on the one hand and the 8 and 10 percent on the other can be transferred to the holders of equities. This is discriminatory against small companies. It loses revenue of at least $50,000,000 a year, possibly more; and it seems to me to violate the principles of equity as well as the desire to raise more revenue.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I see my charming friend from Oklahoma rising. Since I refused to yield to the Senator from Ohio, I can hardly discriminate in favor of my good friend from Oklahoma, much as I should like to do so.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a one-third-of-a-second observation?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. KERR. I would suppose that my distinguished friend from Illinois would like to have such inaccuracies as he has stated called to his attention at the time they are made, rather than at a later time; but I shall be glad to wait.

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; I shall be glad to have the Senator correct any inaccurate statement I may have made.

Mr. KERR. Will the Senator repeat the figure he gave as to what a company having $5,000,000 equity capital and $5,000,000 bonded indebtedness would receive in the way of profits, exempt from excess profits tax, under the House bill, as contrasted to the provisions of the Senate bill?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Under the House bill, the amount which would be exempted, according to my figures, would be $650,000.

Mr. KERR. How did the Senator arrive at that figure?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Twelve percent of $5,000,000, which is the exemption stated; that is, if we look at the report on page 8, the equity capital retained, earnings, and borrowed capital, under $5,000,000, to 12 percent; so the 12 percent of that would be $600,000. Then there would be the added provision of one-third of the actual interest cost, and I assume a 3-percent-interest rate; so that the total interest cost would be $150,000. One-third of that would be $50,000, and, according to my arithmetic, $600,000 plus $50,000 would be $650,000. If the Senator's arithmetic is superior to that, I should be very glad to have it.

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Oklahoma disclaims any interest in or knowledge of arithmetic, but he can count up to $650,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is based on 12 percent of $5,000,000, plus one-third of $150,000, which equals $650,000.

Mr. KERR. What did the Senator say would be the return on the basis of that computation, under the Senate bill?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Nine hundred and fifty thousand dollars. That would be the net credit before excess profits occurred.

Mr. KERR. How did the Senator arrive at that figure?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That would be composed of a 12-percent rate of earnings on the first $5,000,000, which is $600,000, plus 10-percent earnings on the next $5,000,000, which is $500,000. Six hundred thousand dollars plus $500,000 equals $1,100,000. Is that correct?

Mr. KERR. Six hundred thousand dollars plus $500,000 equals $1,100,000; that is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. To that we agree. From that would be deducted the $150,000 for interest paid, leaving $950,000 remaining. There would be an interest cost of $150,000.

Mr. KERR. There would be a cost of $150,000. Now is the Senator aware of the fact that that is subject to the 47 percent?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I speak simply of the excess-profits rate.

Mr. KERR. The Senator said it would be profit to the stockholder.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I said that the excess-profits rate would not begin until $950,000 has been reached.

Mr. KERR. Did the Senator say there would be an additional benefit of $300,000 to the stockholders?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was not aware of that. I shall check that.

Mr. KERR. If the Senator said that, then he was in error, was he not?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, but the supertax rate would not apply.

Mr. KERR. I understand.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is what I mean to say.

Mr. KERR. Neither would it be profit to the stockholders.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But the supertax rate would not be applied.

Mr. KERR. Does the Senator base that on the second $5,000,000 of the capital structure, under the House bill, so that the corporation would be permitted to earn a maximum of $50,000, free from the excess-profits tax?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It would be permitted to deduct from gross profits the interest actually paid, plus one-third of the interest.

Mr. KERR. One-third would be 1 percent, would it not?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct, if the interest rate is 3 percent.

Mr. KERR. That is the figure the Senator used, is it not?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. KERR. One percent of $5,000,000 would be $50,000, on the borrowed capital. The corporation would be permitted to earn $50,000 free of the excess-profits tax; is that correct?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct. Of course, it would be applied——

Mr. KERR. If the Senator will pardon me one moment. The Senator is aware that that would be subject to the normal surtax, is he not?

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. KERR. That is, of 47 percent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But not surtax—normal tax.

Mr. KERR. And the surtax?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Now, what about the surtax?

Mr. KERR. It is quite an item.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not see how the Senator gets the surtax.

Mr. KERR. The bill provides a total of 47 percent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is the normal tax; not the excess-profits tax.

Mr. KERR. That is normal and surtax, before excess-profits tax.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is there not 30 percent added on top of that.

Mr. KERR. The 30 percent is over and above that.

Mr. DOUGLAS. In what we have been saying, I have been using the rate of 45, as provided by the House bill, and 47, as provided by the Senate bill, as the normal tax, and then an additional 30 percent added above that.

Mr. KERR. It has the same effect, by whatever name it may be called.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is well to get our terms defined.

Mr. KERR. It is well to get them to correspond with the facts of the bill, then we shall easily understand them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. This is what I have been trying to do. We are trying to find a common understanding.

Mr. KERR. Will the Senator join me in requesting the head of the joint staff to tell us what the 47 percent is called?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, will the Senator speak a little louder?

Mr. KERR. If the distinguished Senator from North Dakota is going to remain awake during the argument, I shall be glad to speak loudly enough to make him hear. [Laughter.]

I should like to ask Mr. Stam to inform the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should be willing to make Mr. Stam a Member of the Senate if it lay within my power to do so.

Mr. KERR. For the information of the Senator, I have consulted Mr. Stam in a whispered tone of voice, and he advises me that the 47 percent is known as normal and surtax.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As what is the 30 percent known?

Mr. KERR. The House bill provided an excess-profits tax of not to exceed 30 percent on the earnings of a corporation. It was an excess-profits tax figure.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is really a surtax.

Mr. KERR. It is not so called.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But, in reality, is it not?

Mr. KERR. I am afraid the Senator has now left the position which I thought we took, that we would find out what the technical terms were and use them accordingly. I say it has the same effect.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not certain what the purpose of this exercise in semantics in which the Senator from Oklahoma is indulging may be, but if we go to the average over-all rate of return on bonded indebtedness as well as on equity capital and are able to float the bonds at a much lower rate of interest, it means that the earnings on equity capital before the excess-profits tax begins will be higher than they otherwise would be, and the total amount of the tax will therefore be less. Is there anything wrong with that statement?

Mr. KERR. The only thing that is wrong with it is that it is not correct, if the Senator will permit me to say so. Before we can collect a tax we must know the sum of money to which it is subject.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly.

Mr. KERR. If the Senator will follow me on the line on which I had started, I will show why there would not be any money to which the excess-profits tax would be applied under the proposal which the Senator recommends.

Mr DOUGLAS. Mr. President, would the Senator be willing to save his speech until later?

Mr. KERR. I was going to ask only two more questions.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Who has the floor, Mr. President?

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Illinois has the floor. If he does not like the manner in which the subject has been developed, and if it proves at all embarrassing to him, I shall be glad to wait until the Senator surrenders the floor.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield in order that I may ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I must protest. I have the floor.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Illinois a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall be delighted to answer it.

Mr. LEHMAN. I have been very much interested in the colloquy, and it seems to me very evident, regardless of terminology, that if we consider a company with assets of $10,000,000, which include bonded indebtedness——

Mr. KERR. Bonded indebtedness is not included in the assets of a company.

Mr. LEHMAN. It should not be. But the allowance which the company can claim in computing its excess-profits tax, under the Senate bill, certainly does include all indebtedness, as I understood the statement of the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee. I do not have the calculation, but it seems perfectly self-evident to me that if we make an allowance of 10 or 12 percent on bonded indebtedness, the charge on which is only 2, 2½, 3, or 3½ percent, there is very definitely a gain for the owner and a loss in revenues to the Treasury of the United States. It seems to me, if the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma will permit me to say so, it is axiomatic and must be self-evident to anyone who can make the calculation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank my distinguished colleague from New York. May I say that a rose by any other name would smell as sweet, whether it is called a surtax or something else? The point is that there is an additional tax of 30 percent which is imposed on what is defined as excess profits. The method of computation which the Senate bill adopts means that excess profits will not begin until a much later stage than that which is provided for under the House bill. Therefore, the total amount of revenue raised by the Federal Government will be less. But, however the tax may be designated, under the Senate provision it does not go into effect until the corporation has earned more money than would be the case under the House bill.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I started in by saying that I wanted to finish my statement without yielding. I have yielded to the distinguished Senator from Oklahoma. As always happens, I stirred up a hornet's nest. The hornets come out and they sting; but I now yield to the biggest and buzzingest hornet of them all—the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TAFT. Let us assume that one corporation has $1,000,000 and another corporation has $1,000,000. One is represented by 50 percent equity and 50 percent bonds, and the other by 90 percent equity and 10 percent bonds. Why should not one corporation pay the same tax as the other corporation?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is a question of what constitutes a profit, I would say to the Senator. It is the earnings upon equity capital, not the earnings upon total capital value.

Mr. TAFT. No; I do not think so. I think the whole question is what can be earned on a certain amount of capital. I considered a case yesterday in which a corporation had $20,000,000 of preferred stock. It issued $20,000,000 of debentures. Why should it pay a different tax? Perhaps one company is doing a better job than the other, making more money, and so forth, but I say that is wholly immaterial as between the two companies.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There are always these transitional problems when a caterpillar is about to become a butterfly.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will my good friend from Illinois yield for one more question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope the Senator from Oklahoma, with the geniality which always characterizes him, will permit me to reply to the Senator from Ohio before I take him on.

Normally, I think we should view profits as a return upon the investment by owners. Borrowings are not investments by owners; they are money received from banks or from the general investing public. I had always thought that interest on loans was a cost and that profits accrued only after interest was paid. I would say that is about the most fundamental accounting principle. Bonds are indebtedness which a corporation owes, and the remainder of the capital is an equity which the stockholders own. I thought that was elementary accounting. This is a very important point, because if we get an average over-all return on the total capital, whether it be raised from borrowings or from equity of the owner, we give to the owners of the equity the difference between the rate of return allowed on the borrowed capital and the actual interest on the borrowed capital——

Mr. GEORGE. But we do not allow the borrower to deduct any interest. For all intents and purposes it is the capital of the borrower.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I cannot understand that it is the capital of the borrower. It is a debt of the borrower. I do not believe we should grant the same profits on debts as we do on equity capital. Bonds are debts.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator wants to engage in that sort of thimble-rigging it is all right; but if a corporation borrows money and is not entitled to take a deduction for any interest paid upon the money, and if it uses the money in its business, why should it not be regarded as a part of its capital?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Because it is a debt of the corporation.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, I know that; but it is not entitled to deduct anything for interest paid on it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It becomes a cost and is deducted from gross revenue before any net revenue is arrived at. If a corporation is permitted 12 percent on its borrowed capital and pays 3 percent interest, is it not perfectly clear that the net benefit is 9 percent, even if interest is not deducted?

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for one question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall be delighted to yield.

Mr. KERR. Is the Senator aware of the fact that under the House bill the limit a corporation can make on borrowed capital before beginning to compute the excess-profits tax is approximately one-half of 1 percent?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does the Senator mean after taxes are deducted?

Mr. KERR. The limit which a corporation could earn and keep under the House bill on borrowed capital before beginning to pay on excess profits would be approximately one-half of 1 percent. Did the Senator know that?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think I know it. I think I see it through a glass darkly. However, I would appreciate it if my friend would indicate the arithmetic which he uses so that I may see his point face to face.

Mr. KERR. That is what I was about to do when the Senator interrupted with his usual eloquence and his exercise of a privilege which he was entitled to exercise.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thought the Senator was addressing a question to me.

Mr. KERR. Yes. Take a corporation which has $5,000,000 of borrowed money. Under the House bill it is permitted to earn $50,000 on its borrowed capital.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Which is one-half of 1 percent?

Mr. KERR. One-half of 1 percent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. How does the Senator arrive at the one-half of 1 percent?

Mr. KERR. It pays 47 percent in normal and surtax.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is what I thought the Senator meant. To be precise, it is 0.53 percent.

Mr. KERR. That is approximately one-half of 1 percent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Approximately; that is correct.

Mr. KERR. I should like to have the Senator tell me if he thinks any corporation would be foolish enough to borrow $5,000,000 to invest in its business if the limit which it could earn on the $5,000,000 was $26,000 a year; or if any corporation which had $5,000,000 to lend would lend it to a company which under the law could earn only $26,000 a year on the $5,000,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is much more of a financier than I am, and 0.53 percent may not seem like very much to my distinguished friend from Oklahoma, but to the poor Senator from Illinois it is fairly decent.

Mr. KERR. Does the poor Senator from Illinois think he could borrow $5,000,000 on that basis?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I could never borrow anything like $5,000,000.

Mr. KERR. Could he lend anything like $5,000,000?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; I am not in the class with the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Illinois would not have to be in my class. To be able to do it would not put the Senator from Illinois in my class, because he is more nearly in my class than he would think. However, does the Senator think that anyone would borrow or lend $5,000,000 if the extent of the profit that could be realized on it was $26,000 a year?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Is it not true that 133 percent of the actual interest payment can be used as a taxable deduction by the company?

Mr. KERR. The 133 percent is not subject to the excess-profits tax. However, of that amount, or 4 percent of the total in the Senator's illustration, 3 percent goes to pay interest which is not retained by the corporation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. KERR. That leaves 1 percent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. KERR. Under the law, 47 percent goes to Uncle Sam in normal and surtax.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But not the additional tax of 30 percent.

Mr. KERR. No; because in that case it would be permitted to earn only one-fourth of 1 percent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes. I believe the House was quite generous.

Mr. KERR. The Senator thinks so?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. KERR. The Senator thinks that borrowers would want to borrow and lenders would want to lend money when the maximum profit that could be earned and kept was approximately one-half of 1 percent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As a matter of fact, is that not a fairly good rate of earning?

Mr. KERR. As a matter of fact, I do not know of anyone who would be so foolish as to borrow it if the most he could expect to earn, out of which to pay it back, was one-half of 1 percent a year, because it would take 200 years to retire his capital; nor do I know of anyone who owned that kind of money who would be so perfectly silly as to lend if it took 200 years in which to get it back.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I may say to my good friend from Oklahoma that I do not insist on rigidly following the House formula. Perhaps we might increase it not one and one-third times, but perhaps one and one-half times. However, I should like to ask my good friend to consider the other aspect of the situation. If of the $10,000,000 capitalization of the corporation to which he refers $5,000,000 was in equity capital and $5,000,000 in borrowed capital, the $5,000,000 in equity capital under the Senator's formula would be earning $950,000, or 19 percent, before being subject to excess-profits tax. Does he regard that as necessary to get equity capital?

Mr. KERR. I am glad the Senator asked that question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I hope the Senator will answer it.

Mr. KERR. I will. A company borrowing $5,000,000 under the illustration given by the Senator from Illinois, and on the basis of the figures which the Senator gave——

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am talking about the equity capital. That is the question I was asking. That is the point I made. Does the company need to get 19 percent in earnings?

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, I know of no Senator who is more insistent on being permitted to answer questions than the Senator from Illinois. I would appreciate it if he would accord the same privilege to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator answer the question?

Mr. KERR. I shall be glad to if the Senator from Illinois will permit me to do so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should like to hear the Senator's answer.

Mr. KERR. The company, under the illustration given by the Senator, borrows $5,000,000. If it pays 3 percent interest, and if it is permitted to earn a total of 10 percent, it would leave a net of 7 percent, because under the law on the second $5,000,000 the company is permitted to earn 10 percent.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. KERR. That leaves the company at that point a maximum of 7 percent on $5,000,000, which is $350,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. KERR. It must pay 47 percent of that in normal and surtax.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That brings us back to the point at which we started. They are not additional excess profits, although its earnings are increased.

Mr. KERR. It does not make any difference to the company whether it pays these earnings to the Government in the form of normal and surtax or excess-profits tax. On the one hand, it has completely parted title to it, and on the other hand the Government has completely received the money. Is that not correct?

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Government has not received the additional tax which we call the excess-profits tax.

Mr. KERR. There is no way in which the Government can receive the same dollar more than once.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is not the additional tax of 30 percent levied on that $350,000.

Mr. KERR. The company does not have the $350,000, because it pays normal and surtax of 47 percent. That leaves approximately $175,000 earned on the $5,000,000. Is the Senator aware that when that passes to the stockholders in the form of dividends, the average stockholder pays 50 percent of that to the Government?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Certainly. I think it may well be that in an ideal community we should tax only income when received by individuals or when reinvested by a company in a business. It is quite possible that the whole system of corporate taxation results in double taxation. However, the Senator is not proposing to throw out that formula, is he?

Mr. KERR. Not at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I say that the excess profits should begin at an earlier stage than they are arrived at under the formula of the Committee on Finance. I say excess profits are earnings on equity capital. If the Senator says they are earnings on total capital, and the owner's equity capital should get an added rate of return for the differences between the cost on borrowed capital and the allowed rate of return on borrowed capital, our assumptions are different, and we would vote differently. However, I am at least trying to indicate what the issue is.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. KERR. Is it not entirely possible that excess-profits taxes are those which begin on profits which are excess, or above normal?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I had never regarded a debt as an asset of the owner. It is extraordinary to have an exponent of sound finance say that debt is an asset of the owner of the company. I always considered debt to be a liability.

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Oklahoma calls attention to the fact that wherever there is a liability there must be an asset.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But not in the same hands.

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I am taking up more time of the Senate than the junior Senator from Illinois deserves, although the subject is important. I have no desire to delay consideration of the bill. I have no desire to take more time than necessary. If the Senator from Maine has some burning question which he would like to put, it would be ungracious of me not to yield; but upon his head and not upon mine be any delay.

Mr. BREWSTER. I have not hitherto occupied any time of the Senate or of the Senator from Illinois on this subject.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BREWSTER. It occurred to me, that, having been raised within 10 miles of where the Senator from Illinois was raised, in very humble circumstances, we might reduce this discussion from millions to de minimis and perhaps arrive at the equities which the Senator from Illinois seeks. I may say that I have considerable sympathy with what I understand to be the position of the Senator from Illinois. As I understand him, the Senator from Illinois feels that the debt of a corporation is not the investment of the owner, but is rather the investment of the lender.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes. What I am saying is that the debt of a corporation is an obligation of the corporation.

Mr. BREWSTER. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But that the real investment of the owner consists of the equity capital.

Mr. BREWSTER. But the obligation under the debt is not an investment of the owner.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is correct.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is what I tried to say.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BREWSTER. That is what I understand. Getting the discussion down to the level of transactions with which we in Maine are familiar, about all we have in Maine are very small mortgages. If one should buy a $10,000 house and borrowed $5,000, getting the other $5,000 from some other source, when he got the $5,000 under the mortgage, would the money at that point belong to him or to the mortgagor?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I should say that his equity in the house, what he owns, is $5,000.

Mr. BREWSTER. I am asking the Senator about the $5,000 which is borrowed. Is that the money of the borrower, or is it someone else's money?

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is someone else's money.

Mr. BREWSTER. The borrower has borrowed it and given his note for it. Is it not his money?

Mr. DOUGLAS. But he has an obligation for an equal amount, so that his net worth is the $5,000 equity.

Mr. BREWSTER. I was trying to get at the matter of investment. The borrower has invested $10,000 in the house, $5,000 in money of his own, and $5,000 in money which he borrowed, for which he gave his note. Once the borrower gave his note, the money no longer belonged to the lender, but to the borrower, and he invested it in the house.

Mr. DOUGLAS. But he had an obligation of $5,000 in return for the money he borrowed.

Mr. BREWSTER. That obligation represents an obligation against the investment, against the equity.

I think there is some equity in the position of the Senator from Illinois, but I do not think it is 100 percent. Certainly the risk of the equity owner when he imperils his investment is entitled to some consideration. Whether we give it too much or too little may be argued; but certainly the Senator from Illinois will not claim that the borrower is not entitled to some consideration when he risks everything he has, including his good name.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The borrower will get a return on the bonds which he holds. The House bill allows this. I am simply saying that borrowed capital should not be allowed exactly the same status as equity capital for the purposes of an excess-profits tax.

I agree that recognition should be given for risks incurred in borrowing money. That is what the House bill proposed to do in the most logical manner. Since the degree of risk is reflected in the rate of interest, the House properly varied the credit with the interest cost and not simply with the amount of debt.

I should like to make another point.

I am not certain, but I think that the proportion of equity capital is greater in the case of small business than in the case of large business. Small businesses are unable to float bonds or borrow from banks to the same extent that large companies do. So the proposal of the Senate Finance Committee, in addition to taking revenue from the Government, favors the big concerns which have a larger proportion of their capital in the form of borrowed money than do smaller firms.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I yield.

Mr. KERR. Is not the Senator perfectly aware that the facts are just the opposite? It is the small outfits which have to borrow money. The larger concerns are investing their own money, in the main. Is not the Senator aware of the statement of General Motors as to how much of its capital is borrowed, and how much is equity?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will accept that. Let me modify my statement, if I may.

Mr. KERR. I shall be delighted to have the Senator modify it to conform to the actualities.

Mr. DOUGLAS. There is something in what the Senator from Oklahoma says so far as corporations with assets below $250,000 are concerned. But there is another point that should be borne in mind. That is that the small business must pay a higher rate of interest on such borrowing as it makes. Therefore, the difference between the average rate of return which is allowed under this bill and the amount which has to be paid to the lender is less in the case of the smaller concern than in the case of the larger concern. Therefore, the small concern does not benefit to the same degree as does the large concern.

Mr. KERR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I am glad to yield. I do not know how I got into this, but I am in it, and I shall simply try to bear my shield with honor.

Mr. KERR. Is not the Senator aware of the fact that a company whose total assets are more than $10,000,000 is permitted to earn only 8 percent on its total, on the amount which is above $10,000,000?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; the increment above that.

Mr. KERR. That provision was intended to bring about a situation under which the big borrower would not be permitted to earn any more net on his borrowed money than the small borrower. So for the little borrower, who would certainly be one with assets of less than $5,000,000——

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LUCAS. How far apart must Senators stand when they argue with one another?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no fixed rule. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I thank my colleague from Illinois for reminding my colleague from Oklahoma as to what the parliamentary situation is.

Mr. KERR. Since we have been reminded of it, will the Senator be so kind as to tell me what it is?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thought I had the floor.

Mr. KERR. I thought the Senator had yielded to me for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I was listening to a statement.

Mr. KERR. If the Senator declines to permit me to proceed on the basis of his yielding to me, I shall retire.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would not hurt the feelings of the Senator from Oklahoma for the world.

Mr. KERR. The Senator from Oklahoma is very grateful to the Senator from Illinois. May I assume that I have permission to continue to ask the question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes; but I hope the Senator, with his usual politeness, will observe some length limitation on the amount of preparatory matter with which he prefaces his question.

Mr. KERR. If the Senator declines able to go back with me to the question from fields into which we have rambled in the discussion of it, I ask him if he is not aware of the fact that a small corporation which has the benefit of the 12-percent allowance would receive actually a greater return on the investment money which it borrows than would the big corporation under the 8-percent limitation on it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Under another feature of the bill.

Mr. KERR. Under this very feature with reference to the credit for total invested and borrowed capital.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Only under the provisions of the Senate committee bill allowing the same rate of return on borrowed capital as on equity capital. It is not the same in the House bill.

Mr. KERR. Does not the Senator understand that if the small borrower pays a total of 8 percent——

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is on the total amount of capital, not on the proportionate distribution.

Mr. KERR. It is on the total, including the borrowed capital. But if he borrows capital within the $5,000,000 limit, he is given a 12 percent credit, even though he pays 8 percent interest or 7 percent interest. If he paid 7 percent interest, he would have 5 percent left; and if the big borrower paid 4 percent interest and had a total of 8, he would have only 4 percent left.

So the bill is found to encourage the smaller earners, and in doing so it would permit expanded operation, which would result in increased production, increased business, increased profit, and therefore increased taxes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Oklahoma for his remarks. But it is a novel idea to me that small business is now considered to be those with assets below $10,000,000. Within this range it is perfectly clear that the typically small company with assets less than $500,000 or so is at a financial disadvantage compared with one of $10,000,000 assets.

Mr. President, I do not want to take up much more time. I merely want to ask the Senate to consider the question of the railway provisions a little more thoroughly than perhaps has been the case. As Senators know, there is a third method of computing the base for excess-profits taxation which applies to electric-light companies and gas companies. They are allowed 6 percent on their assets, after income tax, before they are subject to excess-profits tax. Telephone companies and airlines are allowed 7 percent. Railways are allowed 6 percent after income tax, before the additional tax on excess profits begins.

RAILROADS VIRTUALLY EXEMPTED

I am not certain what the precise way of dealing with the railway situation is. I think there are certain considerations that should be borne in mind. One is that railway earnings are volatile, and that when the car capacity is utilized more fully net earnings shoot up much more rapidly than gross revenue. I have worked out some tables on the rate of return on net worth of railways. They went up to about 20 percent on net worth, that would be on equity, in 1943. We can expect railway revenues to rise very largely in this period of military preparation and possible war. The volume of traffic will increase very greatly, both passenger and freight. That will send earnings up much more rapidly than the increase in traffic because there will be a fuller utilization of facilities.

There is a second factor which I think needs to be borne in mind. That is, that the railway rates on Government freight will be much higher during the coming period than they were during the last war. As I remember roughly the history of this subject, it is that in the period around 1870 the Government, in consideration of giving large grants of land to the railways, provided that the railways should carry Government freight free of cost. Then at a later period, I think it was in the 1880's or 1890's, that was changed to provide that Government freight should be carried at one-half normal rates. That provision existed in World War I and through World War II. But the Seventy-ninth Congress repealed this measure, and now Government freight has to be carried at normal rates, full rates. So we may expect railway revenues to rise very, very sharply, and net revenues to rise very, very sharply during the period which lies ahead, both from an increase in volume of traffic and from an increase in rates on Government freight.

Government freight and passenger traffic will, of course, constitute a tremendous portion of the total traffic. I think these facts should be borne in mind in deciding whether or not we should grant a 6-percent guaranteed return to railways before excess profits taxes begin.

Mr. President, that concludes all I have to say. I wish to thank my colleagues for their patience.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. DOUGLAS. Vote on what, may I ask, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is open to amendment. Is there any further amendment to be offered to the bill?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, Mr. President. On page 2, line 22, I move to change the figure "60" percent of excess profits to the figure "70" percent of excess profits. This will yield an added $370,000,000 revenue.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. McMAHON. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. At the appropriate place in the bill it is proposed to add a new section as follows:

SEC. —. The import tax imposed under section 3425 of the Internal Revenue Code shall not apply with respect to articles (other than copper sulfate and other than composition metal provided for in paragraph 1657 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, which is suitable both in its composition and shape, without further refining or alloying, for processing into castings, not including as castings ingots or similar cast forms) entered for consumption or withdrawn from warehouse for consumption during the period beginning July 1, 1950, and ending with the close of June 30, 1952.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut. All in favor of the amendment——

Mr. McMAHON rose.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair believes the Senator from Connecticut was first on his feet.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut was not talking.

Mr. McMAHON. If the amendment were noncontroversial and were going to be adopted, I was certainly going to let it be adopted, but I gather there is some controversy about it.

Mr. President, the situation outlined in the amendment is familiar to the Senate. On August 25 of this year the Senator from Connecticut offered the amendment to cure a very serious situation. It was temporarily withdrawn, but I again offered it on September 1, and the Senate took action on the amendment by tabling it. The situation it was designed to correct has grown worse. It was because of this fact that I wrote the chairman of the Finance Committee, the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the following letter under date of December 14, 1950:

DECEMBER 14, 1950.

In re House Joint Resolution 502.

Hon. WALTER F. GEORGE,
Chairman, Senate Finance Committee,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR GEORGE: There is still pending before your committee a bill, House Joint Resolution 502, already passed by the House, which would extend until June 30, 1951, the suspension of the import tax on copper. I am most hopeful that you can offer the language of that bill as an amendment to the tax legislation now before your committee.

The situation as to our copper supply is the most acute in our history, even worse than during the height of World War II. Domestic mine production so far this year has averaged about 80,000 tons per month while the recovery from scrap and secondary sources has averaged about 9,000 tons per month. Domestic needs have averaged about 130,000 tons per month so that the deficit, in excess of 40,000 tons per month, has been made up from imports.

Since June 30 of this year all imports have been subject to an excise import tax of $40 per ton so that the price of copper—when it is available—has thus been increased to 26½ cents per pound on hundreds of thousands of tons.

The highly inflationary effect of this price increase is obvious, particularly since it is reflected in the end use of copper in thousands of items. If that's all there were to the problem it would be serious enough.

But, Senator GEORGE, the National Production Authority has ordered a cutback of 15 percent on all copper intended for civilian use. This cutback rate will be increased commencing February 1 to 20 percent, with the further probability that a system of allocations and priorities will have to be imposed.

Stockpile demands of the Government have not been taken into account in the foregoing comment nor have I said anything about defense orders which are being placed at an increased rate. Stockpile needs and defense orders therefore inevitably are taking a larger share of the short supply.

Preparations for defense in the remaining free nations of the world plus the degree of the restoration of production to meet consumer needs, in England, France, and Germany, notably, have caused these countries to enter the world market in competition with us. The foreign sources of supply upon which we have previously depended, notably Chile, and Canada to a lesser degree, consequently are selling their copper abroad to countries which impose no tariff barrier. The result is that even the world supply upon which we must draw to make up our deficits is seriously threatened.

Under such conditions, it seems we can no longer justify continuation of the tariff barrier which is diverting copper from our shores.

You will remember that the House bill would have continued the suspension of the tax from July 1, 1950, until June 30, 1951. Since nearly 6 months of that contemplated period have already expired, I feel that the suspension previously voted by the House should be extended until June 30, 1952. Accordingly I enclose a proposed amendment which would accomplish that result, the language in all other respects being identical with House Joint Resolution 502. Since the pending legislation will unquestionably go to conference, in the light of the situation which I have explained, and which is known to the House, I am confident that the House conferees will not oppose the extension of the suspension until June 30, 1952.

Senator GEORGE, from my own experience with defense plans, I can assure you that the more copper we can bring into the country, the quicker we can bring it in, and the less we have to pay for it, the better off we all will be.

So I bespeak your most earnest and immediate consideration of this urgent problem.

Please believe me, with esteem and best personal wishes,

Sincerely yours.

That letter, which is signed by the Senator from Connecticut, tells the story. This question was debated twice, at great length.

I do not believe that under the circumstances which exist, the imposition of the duty can be justified, and I do not believe it is in the interest of our country to maintain the tariff or the duty in being.

I have offered the amendment. I should like to have it voted on. I do not intend to press the obvious, because if there is anything that is as plain as is the fact that we are now in this Chamber it is that we need all the copper we can get, and we need it as quickly as we can get it.

To impose a tax of 2 cents a pound, or approximately $80,000,000 a year, to further inflate the economy, while at the same time depriving ourselves of copper which we need, simply does not make sense to me.

I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. McFARLAND. Mr. President, I have thought this bill to be a revenue-raising bill, not a bill providing for a reduction of revenue. The amendment the distinguished Senator from Connecticut proposes would reduce the revenue of the United States, rather than increase it.

As has been stated, this amendment has been brought up and considered before, and it has been voted down.

We do not know what would be the effect of the proposed removal of this tax, and we would not know until hearings on the subject were had before the proper committee.

I do not wish to make extended remarks on this subject, unless it is absolutely necessary that I do so. I know there are many corporations which would like to be relieved of their taxes and would like to pay less taxes, just as would the corporations in the State of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut. However, in reducing those taxes, the question is whether we would thereby obtain more of the products we need, regardless of what they might be.

Mr. President, I understood that the distinguished senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] would move that the amendment be laid on the table. With that understanding, I do not care to discuss the amendment in detail at this time. If the motion to lay on the table is rejected, I think we should go into the subject thoroughly, and hold hearings on this question, and make them available to all Members of the Senate. Certainly this matter should be considered in hearings before the committee, rather than be taken up during the time available here on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. My colleague will remember that when copper was selling at a fair price, at one time there was complaint about this tax; and the copper producers throughout the West, where copper is mined, at that time agreed that so long as those conditions existed, they would consent to forego any duty on imported copper. That was done with the distinct understanding, however, that a change in the situation would require that the tax be imposed.

A change did occur. The price of copper dropped heavily, and in a very short period of time, immediately after we had passed a joint resolution extending the time when there would be no duty. That resulted in the discharge of thousands of workers in the copper mines. In our own State there were many, many hundreds of men on unemployment relief, and the situation was very critical.

Our concern primarily is that that condition shall not again develop. For that reason, we must have some kind of assurance about this matter.

What the Senator from Connecticut proposes is that the tariff be removed entirely, for all time to come. That is very different from removing the tariff temporarily, during wartime, at a time when the price of copper is high. A complete removal, for all time to come, as is proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, would cause the market to break as it broke before, and would cause serious unemployment.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. EASTLAND. Is not the subject of the amendment one which should come up on its own merits, and not during the consideration of a tax bill?

Mr. McFARLAND. Certainly it is, and that is the suggestion I would make.

As stated by my colleague, there are many reasons why this tax should not be removed. One reason is that we now have before us a tax-raising bill, not a tax-reduction bill. If we are going to start reducing taxes, let us go right down the line in reducing them; if the Government has reached a point where it does not need any more money, and where we can reduce taxes, let us reduce taxes all down the line, and thus be fair to everyone.

Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield once more to me?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield.

Mr. EASTLAND. This amendment involves the question of a tariff, does it not?

Mr. McFARLAND. It does.

Mr. EASTLAND. The amendment is wholly foreign to the bill now before the Senate, is it not?

Mr. McFARLAND. Yes; it is wholly foreign to it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McFARLAND. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I move that the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut be laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Georgia to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McMAHON].

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment: On page 148, in line 18, after the word "vermiculite," insert the word "perlite."

That insertion would be made before the words "long-fiber asbestos in the form of amosite."

The reason of the amendment, namely, the insertion of the word "perlite" at the point I have indicated, is that I am informed that perlite is a competitive article with vermiculite; and if perlite were not included, the perlite producers would be put out of business.

I have not had a chance to make a thorough check of the facts which have been represented to me. With the consent of the distinguished chairman of the committee, I should like to be able to take this subject to conference, so that we can either include the amendment or exclude it, according to the later development of the facts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. MILLIKIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLIKIN. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 166, in line 4, it is proposed to strike out the words "coal and iron mines," and insert in lieu thereof the words "mines in operation during normal period"; and in line 6 it is proposed to strike out "a coal mining or iron mining property" and insert in lieu thereof "a metal or coal mining property."

On page 65, in lines 5 and 8, it is proposed to strike out "iron ore" and insert in lieu thereof "ore."

On page 165, in line 6, it is proposed to strike out "coal mining property, iron mining property" and insert in lieu thereof "mining property."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire that all the amendments be considered en bloc?

Mr. MILLIKIN. Yes, I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, they will be considered en bloc. Without objection, the amendments are agreed to en bloc. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be offered, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H. R. 9827) was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a unanimous-consent request, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read the unanimous-consent request.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Mr. GEORGE asks unanimous consent that—

(1) The bill be printed with the Senate amendments numbered; and

(2) That in the engrossment of the amendments of the Senate to the bill the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make such changes in section, subsection, and paragraph, etc., numbers and letters and cross-references thereto as may be necessary to the proper numbering and lettering of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the unanimous-consent request is granted, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, request a conference thereon with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. GEORGE, Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. BYRD, Mr. MILLIKIN, and Mr. TAFT conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to announce that the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee has advised me that he will be ready to begin work on the bill in the morning at 9:30, although there would be no formal appointment of his conferees until 12. He stated that, knowing who the conferees would be, however, it would be possible to begin work at 9:30 or 10 o'clock. I suggest that the Senate conferees meet in the Finance Committee room at 9:30, if that is not too early, or at 10 o'clock, in any event. I suggest 9:30.

NOTICE OF INTENTION TO ADDRESS THE SENATE

Mr. HUNT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow morning, following the morning hour, I be given 10 minutes to make an address.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I think there is already a similar request. I understand the Senator from Florida had announced that he wanted the floor. Perhaps he did not get unanimous consent. I respectfully request that the appropriation bill be the order of business immediately after the address of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. HUNT. It will be. I have conserved the time of the Senate very conscientiously for 2 years, and on this occasion I ask for only 10 minutes.

Mr. WHERRY. Would the Senator object to taking the time in connection with the consideration of the appropriation bill?

Mr. LUCAS. I do not have any objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NATIONAL DAY OF PRAYER

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I submit and send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas our country is in an hour of dire danger in which hostile forces, acting without conscience and guided by a godless ideology, threaten the very survival of our cherished institutions; and

Whereas, while we must mobilize our material resources to meet this threat, we are also deeply conscious of the fact that the moral and spiritual resources of our people constitute the Nation's great bulwark in times of national crisis; and

Whereas the churches of the Nation, of all creeds and faiths, are the instruments through which our moral and spiritual resources can best be marshaled and given strength; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate suggests that the churches of the Nation, of all creeds and faiths, set aside and dedicate, Sunday, December 24, 1950, as a time for prayers and supplication for divine guidance of the men and women, elected and appointed, civilian and military, on whose shoulders rests the responsibility for leadership in this time of great crisis, and for strength and unity to enable our people to persevere, with other freedom-loving people, in the effort to bring about peace and justice in the world.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President at this hour in our Nation's history, and at this period of the year, when we are approaching the natal day of the Saviour of mankind, it seems to me that a resolution of this kind could very properly be considered by the Senate of the United States. There was never a time in the history of the United States when the people were so bewildered and so earnestly looking for light and consolation as they are today. We are a Christian Nation. We believe in prayer and supplication to a divine being. Therefore, I ask that this resolution be referred to the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, for report, which I hope will be made by Friday of this week.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution (S. Res. 378) was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. LUCAS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see end of Senate proceedings.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no reports, the clerk will proceed to state the nominations on the Executive Calendar.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg to be Assistant Secretary of Defense.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I speak in opposition to this nomination. On November 30, 1944, there was brought to the attention of the Senate the fact that the State of North Dakota had been discriminated against in the matter of major appointments. Since that time I have spoken to various executive officers and to various Members of the Senate, in an effort to see to it that the State of North Dakota received a square deal.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an observation, without losing his right to the floor?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I desire to make this announcement to the Senate. I hope that we may be able to remain here this evening until we finish, one way or another, our consideration of this nomination and the nomination which immediately follows it, that of Stephen J. Spingarn, to be a Federal Trade Commissioner. I merely mention this to Senators, so they will know that possibly there may be a vote upon one or the other of these nominations this evening. I make the statement further because, now that the tax bill has passed the Senate within a day's time in fact, in 1 day less than many of us believed might be required for its passage considering its importance, it appears that if we can finish this matter tonight, we probably shall be able to conclude our work on Friday evening. I merely hope that the Senate will remain in session until we can finish the consideration of these nominations.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. When is it the Senator's intention to call up the appropriation bill?

Mr. LUCAS. Following the consideration of the unfinished business tomorrow. I was going to make that announcement. We shall take up the appropriation bill tomorrow. The civil defense bill is ready to be considered, and I understand not very much time will be taken on the appropriation bill. Following that we shall take up the civil defense bill, which has been reported from the Armed Services Committee.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the majority leader yield to me?

Mr. LUCAS. Certainly.

Mr. WHERRY. The distinguished Senator stated that he contemplated that the Senate might adjourn or recess on next Friday night. Of course, that means that it would not return until January. It would not be the intention to have the Senate return after Christmas, would it?

Mr. LUCAS. I shall know a little more about it tomorrow if matters move in the direction of being passed upon by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is settled that the appropriation bill will come up first tomorrow?

Mr. LUCAS. Yes. I am wondering, Mr. President, if the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LANGER] would let the Senate approve all the remaining nominations on the calendar without prejudicing his rights.

Mr. LANGER. I deeply and sincerely regret that I cannot agree to that.

Mr. President, although I have made objections to the fact that North Dakota has received no major appointments of any moment since 1944, in spite of all the protests I have made, I invite attention to the fact that on Friday, December 8, approximately 10 days ago, I announced that I would oppose any further nominations, and stated as follows:

Mr. President, last evening when the calendar was called in executive session I did not object to the confirmation of the various individuals who have been nominated to office. Time and time again on the floor of the Senate I have called the attention of the Senate and of the administration to the fact that no citizen of North Dakota has been named to head any important office. Year after year has gone by without any citizen of North Dakota being nominated to any such office.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield. I continue reading, Mr. President:

At the present time no citizen of North Dakota is serving as ambassador or consul, and you all know that there is no better group of people anywhere than North Dakota people. One New York man after another has been named, and at one time there were six members of the Cabinet who had been appointed from the State of New York, and last night we confirmed another New Yorker.

Mr. President, I am serving notice that the next time the Senate is called on to confirm anyone to head any office I propose to oppose the confirmation. I shall do all in my power to see to it that the people of North Dakota finally get the recognition to which they have been entitled ever since the State was admitted into the Union in 1889. I want the Senators to know exactly how I feel on the subject. I have taken up the matter time and time again, and if in order to get results I must cause delay and take the time of the Senate, even in these critical times, I propose to do it. North Dakota is a part of these United States, the citizens pay a large share of the taxes, and I propose to see that some citizens from there will have something to do with the real operation of this Government.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield.

Mr. President, on the Executive Calendar today what do we find? We find three more nominations from the State of New York—Anna M. Rosenberg, to be Assistant Secretary of Defense; Stephen J. Spingarn, to be a member of the Federal Trade Commission, and Charles E. Wilson, to be Director of Defense Mobilization.

So I repeat, Mr. President, that I do intend to plead that the State of North Dakota gets justice.

Mr. President, I wrote to former Secretary of State Stettinius in 1944 and asked him to give me a list of the number of persons serving in the Department of State and how many of them were from North Dakota. I received a reply from Mr. Stettinius which was as follows:

MY DEAR SENATOR LANGER: In response to your telephone request of this morning there is attached a statement showing the total number of personnel of the Department of State as of November 30, 1944. I understand that you are interested only in the totals and, consequently, I have made no further breakdown as between American and aliens, officer and clerical, etc. If you wish further information please let me know.

Mr. President, I want to say to the Senate that Mr. Stettinius replied promptly and very frankly. At that time he attached a statement which showed that the Department of State, as of November 30, 1944, had a total personnel in the Department service in the United States of 3,142, and in the foreign service a total of 5,784, or a grand total employed in the Department of State alone—and I might add, according to the figures of the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], the number in the State Department has since been increased—at that time there was a total of 8,926 persons. At that time, as I said, not one of them came from the State of North Dakota. The situation has not changed, Mr. President.

At that time, in Argentina, for example, the State Department employed 138 persons, not one of whom came from North Dakota.

In Australia it employed 63 persons, not one of whom came from North Dakota.

It employed in Belgium 48 persons, not one of whom came from North Dakota.

In Bolivia it employed 67 persons, not one of them came from North Dakota.

In Brazil the total number of employed personnel was 359, not one came from North Dakota.

In Bulgaria the State Department employed six persons, not one of whom came from North Dakota.

In Canada, right next to the State of North Dakota, 255 persons were employed by the State Department, but not one of them came from North Dakota.

In Chile, the State Department employed 167 persons, not one of them came from North Dakota.

In China, there were 102 persons employed by the State Department, but not one of them came from North Dakota.

In Colombia the State Department employed 120 persons, not one of whom came from North Dakota.

In Costa Rica the State Department employed 51 persons, but not one of them came from North Dakota.

In Cuba the State Department employed 141 persons, but not one of them came from North Dakota.

In Czechoslovakia six were employed but none of them came from North Dakota.

In Denmark there were three, but there was not one from North Dakota.

In the Dominican Republic 46 were employed, but not one came from North Dakota.

In Egypt, 101, but not one comes from North Dakota; in El Salvador, 30, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Ecuador, 70, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Ethiopia, 30, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Finland, 9, but not one comes from North Dakota; in France, 230, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Great Britain, 726, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Greece, 21, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Guatemala, 38, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Honduras, 38, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Haiti, 48, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Iceland, 15, but not one comes from North Dakota. Mr. President, there are more people living in North Dakota who came from Iceland than in any other State of the Union. We had a judge on our supreme court who came from Iceland. We have had district court judges who originally came from Iceland. Some of them made outstanding records in the United States. One of them became a leading lawyer in Portland, Oreg. Apparently the administration could not appoint one of them to a single position over there. In Iran, 63, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Iraq, 42, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Ireland, 50, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Italy, 68, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Lebanon, 34, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Libya, 16, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Luxemburg, 4, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Mexico, 468, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Morocco, 65, but not one comes from North Dakota; in the Netherlands, 28, but not one comes from North Dakota; in New Zealand, 33, but not one comes from North Dakota; in Nicaragua, 61, but not one comes from North Dakota. In Norway, 7, but not one comes from North Dakota. I may add, Mr. President, that 40 percent of the population of North Dakota is of Scandinavian stock. However, not one citizen of North Dakota has been appointed to any position in Norway. With the possible exception of Minnesota—and I think there are more Swedes in Minnesota than Norwegians—North Dakota has the greatest Norwegian population of any State in the Union. Palestine, 23, but not one comes from North Dakota; Panama, 74, but not one comes from North Dakota; Uruguay, 40, but not one comes from North Dakota; Peru, 96, but not one comes from North Dakota; Poland, 16, but not one comes from North Dakota; Portugal, 156, but not one comes from North Dakota; Rumania, 5, but not one comes from North Dakota; Saudi Arabia, 20, but not one comes from North Dakota; Spain, 250, but not one comes from North Dakota; Sweden, 165, but not one comes from North Dakota. We have a large Swedish population. Nevertheless, not one comes from North Dakota. Switzerland, 152, but not one comes from North Dakota; Syria, 15, but not one comes from North Dakota; Turkey, 155, but not one comes from North Dakota; the Union of South Africa, 64, but not one comes from North Dakota; Soviet Russia, 104, but not one comes from North Dakota; Venezuela, 58, but not one comes from North Dakota; Yugoslavia, 8, but not one comes from North Dakota; Vatican City, 11, but not one comes from North Dakota. In the United States, assigned to Washington, are 395. Not one comes from North Dakota. The United States Dispatch Agency, 20, and not one comes from North Dakota.

I assert, Mr. President, that out of a total of 5,784, not a single appointment was from the State of North Dakota. In addition, Mr. President, there are 3,141 in the departmental service, and not one, so far as I know, has come from the State of North Dakota. Not one person from North Dakota has been appointed at the head of any one of these services.

Mr. President, I realize, of course, that if the State of North Dakota did not have people who are qualified to fill some of these positions, they ought not to be appointed. However, I call attention to the fact that North Dakota has an outstanding record when it comes to men and women who have distinguished themselves in the arts, sciences, medicine, and business. I have repeatedly referred to some of these people on the floor of the Senate. Let us take, for example, medicine. If today one of my distinguished colleagues should become desperately ill and if he were taken to Rochester, Minn., for treatment by the Mayo brothers at their great hospital, and if all the doctors there could not decide what was wrong with the distinguished Senator, the one doctor who would have the final say as to whether the Senator should be operated on, and for what, is a North Dakotan. He was graduated from the University of North Dakota. He has the final authority. If any Senator were to go to General Motors to buy a truck—as, for example, if my good friend from Virginia [Senator BYRD] were to go to General Motors to buy a truck to haul his apples—he would buy a Fargo truck, which is a truck built and designed by a man from Fargo, N. Dak. He is the leading authority in the world on trucks. If today one of my distinguished colleagues wanted to buy a diamond, or if he had a lawsuit involving diamonds, or if he wished to buy a diamond mine in South Africa or anywhere else in the world, and he wanted to be absolutely sure that he was getting his money's worth, the final authority that he would consult would be Charlie Boise, who has offices in London, New York, and other places. He was born on a North Dakota farm near Sherbrook in Steele County, N. Dak. To show that North Dakotans have always come out on top whenever they have had an opportunity, I remember that in World War I President Wilson found that there was graft and crookedness in the buying of goods for the Navy. He selected a young man from North Dakota, John Hancock, who was born at Emerado, N. Dak., a little town of less than 100 people. He placed him in charge of buying $2,000,000,000 worth of property for the Navy. He did so well that there was not one breath of scandal. He did such a good job that he was assigned to buy goods for the Army in World War II. Today he is the only man in all America who holds distinguished service medals from both the Army and Navy. Later he became one of the outstanding financiers in the country, and one of the great patriotic men of America. He was a director of the New York Stock Exchange, and a partner in Lehman Bros. in New York.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield for any purpose.

Mr. MAYBANK. If the Senator——

Mr. LANGER. I am sorry. I deeply regret it, but I decline to yield. I have waited for a long time to give this speech, and I intend to give it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President——

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I decline to yield for any purpose.

Mr. MAYBANK. The Senator and I have been friends. I should like to make a suggestion to him.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I decline to yield for any purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota declines to yield.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, when Franklin Roosevelt became President, we all remember that the banks were in desperate shape. They were collapsing. In my State alone 561 banks out of approximately 700 closed their doors. All over the country the same thing was happening. There was a cry on the part of some to nationalize the banking industry. Franklin Delano Roosevelt looked all over the United States to find someone who could handle the banking situation. He picked out a North Dakota boy, J. F. T. O'Connor, from Grand Forks, N. Dak., a boy who was so poor that when he went to the country school he took off his shoes and walked in his bare feet to save shoe leather. J. F. T. O'Connor did a job so good that Henry Ford, who had $164,000,000 on deposit in the banks of Detroit, Mich., and who feared that he would lose most of that money and that thousands of men would be out of employment, paid him the public compliment of saying that he had done a magnificent job, and that in his judgment no man could have done better.

Coming back to the automobile industry, if anyone wishes to buy a Nash automobile, he should know that the president of the Nash Motor Co. is a North Dakota boy, George Mason. He has made an outstanding record. He sells a product which, in the judgment of many North Dakota people, is not equaled by any other automobile.

If a lady wishes to buy a refrigerator, and she buys a Kelvinator, a North Dakota boy, born at Valley City, N. Dak., is president of that company.

Only a short time ago the Pulitzer prize was awarded to a North Dakota man for having written the best play of the year.

Down in North Carolina, at Duke University, a young North Dakota boy named Grimson, 34 years old, is at the head of the surgical department. Only a short time ago, Life and Fortune magazines wrote up the marvelous discoveries which he had made, which are going to result in saving hundreds of thousands of lives.

Some time ago I made a list of North Dakota citizens who have distinguished themselves—particularly the womenfolk—which I placed in the RECORD here. When World War II was over—and I say this with all deference to distinguished Senators who are present this evening—France sent to this country a committee to find the typical American nurse. The committee visited every State in the Union, as well as the District of Columbia. When they were through, they selected a little 18-year-old girl from Wahpeton, N. Dak., named Rose Lauder. If one goes to Paris today, in a great public square he will find a life-sized statue of Rose Lauder.

When it comes to bravery the records show that the women of North Dakota have an outstanding record. Let me give an illustration. On a day when Hiram Johnson and Robert La Follette were fighting it out in the North Dakota presidential primary—I believe it was the 17th of March—one of the greatest blizzards in the history of the State occurred. In a little schoolhouse near Center, N. Dak., in Oliver County, there was a little girl 16 years of age, named Hazel Miner. With her were her younger sister and brother. When the teacher dismissed the school the three children drove away on a sled. The family lived about a mile and a half from the schoolhouse. The three children became lost. When they were found the next day, the searchers discovered that Hazel Miner had taken off her overcoat and placed it around the two smaller children. She had taken off her overshoes, and she had placed all the robes in the sled around the two small children. Then she lay down between them to die. She was found dead, but the two smaller children were alive and well. Today if one goes to North Dakota, in the public square around the courthouse at Center, N. Dak., he will find a life-sized statue erected to the memory of that brave little 16-year-old girl.

Mr. President, let us examine the war record of North Dakota. The question may be asked as to why someone from North Dakota has not been appointed to some job in the Government service. What is the matter? Only the day before yesterday newspapers throughout the country announced that very soon the National Guard from two of the States would be called into active service. The report stated that it was considered that one of the National Guard units most nearly ready was from the State of North Dakota. I am very proud to make that statement.

In the Spanish-American War, population considered, more North Dakota men and boys were decorated for bravery than from any other State in the Union. The same thing occurred again in World War I.

It is a tribute to the fine Christian upbringing of the boys in our State, Mr. President, that after World War I, when the veterans' hospitals were established, there were fewer boys from North Dakota than from any other State in the Union who were taken to veterans' hospitals to be treated for venereal disease.

Every soldier in this country is familiar with the fact that at Guadalcanal in the last war more North Dakota boys were decorated for bravery in one battle than ever before in the history of the country.

Mr. President, there might be some reason why North Dakota is being discriminated against, but I want to say very frankly that up to the present time I have been unable to discover it. I may say to my colleagues that it cannot be because of lack of bravery on the part of North Dakota boys in World War II. Brig. Gen. Albert Hartle, for instance, who distinguished himself in the Aleutian campaign and later in the Pacific theater, and who now has a beach named after him in the Aleutian Islands, is a North Dakota farm boy.

Let us go back to the subject of business again. Who organized the Cream of Wheat Co., one of the big business concerns of this country? The president of that company is Daniel F. Bull. It is located in Minneapolis. He was a North Dakota boy, and he organized that company.

I say, Mr. President, whether in the arts, in science, medicine, or agriculture North Dakota men have risen to the very top. Let us consider agriculture. At a time when we were trying to produce flax, during World War I, when we needed flax and needed linseed oil, who came to the rescue? Dr. H. L. Bolley, of Fargo, N. Dak., produced a wilt-resisting flax, and thereby increased the yield of flax threefold in this country.

Mr. President, we have a Bureau of Indian Affairs in our Government.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER [Mr. CHAPMAN in the chair]. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield.

We have in our Government a Bureau of Indian Affairs. In North Dakota we have four Indian reservations. We have many Indians there. Yet since statehood, 61 years ago—and I want every Senator upon this floor to listen carefully—in spite of that large Indian population we have never had a Commissioner of Indian Affairs, we have never had a first assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs, we have never had a second assistant Commissioner, we have never had a third assistant Commissioner, we have never had a fourth assistant Commissioner, we have never had a fifth assistant Indian Commissioner, we have never had a sixth assistant Commissioner, we have not even had a seventh assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. MAYBANK rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield. I regret to say I cannot yield at this time.

Mr. MAYBANK. Will not the Senator recommended a person to be Assistant Indian Commissioner?

Mr. LANGER. This afternoon there was mentioned the great State of New Mexico. I am glad the State of New Mexico has received its share of appointments. That State is securing its share of appointments right along. Members of the Cabinet have come from that State, and I am proud of them. Three Indian Commissioners in a row came from that State. But when the delegation from North Dakota recommended a man who was endorsed by the State University of North Dakota, a man who has studied every Indian tribe in the United States, whose doctor of philosophy thesis dealt with the subject of Indians, who had lived among the Indians, who had gone to Flagstaff, Ariz., and investigated the Hopis, who had studied the Navajos in New Mexico, and who had gone to Alaska and become acquainted with the Indian tribes up there—was he appointed? He was not. He was not appointed either a Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or first assistant, or second assistant, or third, or fourth, or fifth, or sixth, or seventh assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs. He received exactly nothing, although he was endorsed unanimously by the people of North Dakota, who were thoroughly familiar with the Indian question.

So, Mr. President, today I am here pleading that the State of North Dakota be recognized, and that a man from North Dakota may be named either Commissioner of Indian Affairs or first assistant, or second assistant, or third assistant, or fourth assistant. But I should like at least to have a man from North Dakota named first assistant, if that can possibly be done. As a matter of fact, we should have a man coming from our State to be Indian Commissioner. So far we have simply been unable to secure the appointment of any man from North Dakota to that position.

That is not all, Mr. President. I know that every Senator will shrink with horror at what I am now going to say. In this great country of ours, under our Anglo-Saxon system of jurisprudence, every man wants to believe that he receives a fair trial. North Dakota belongs to the eighth judicial circuit. Would Senators believe me when I tell them that from statehood, in October 1889, up to the present time, there has never been one single representative of the State of North Dakota on the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Judicial District? Oh, three men have been appointed to that court from Minnesota at the same time, and two or three from the State of Nebraska. But North Dakota has not had one in 61 years, since statehood. When next there is a vacancy for a position on that court I intend to oppose any lawyer or judge being appointed to that position unless he comes from the State of North Dakota, so that we may at least have one man out of the great number of men on that bench, on the court of appeals, who is familiar with the problems we have in the State of North Dakota. We are entitled to such representation. I believe that when Senators realize that we have had no representative on the court of appeals from North Dakota for 61 years, that in case a man from some other State is named for a vacancy to that court they will not confirm him; that confirmation will be put over until someone from North Dakota is named to the position.

Mr. President, in 61 years no member of the Cabinet has been a resident of North Dakota. When I spoke about this matter in 1944, I named five men and one woman, residents of New York State—residents of only that one State, Mr. President—who were members of the President's Cabinet on that day. I have no objection to those who come from New York, for I like New York; I have the deepest affection for New York, for that is where I met my wife. New York is a splendid State and it has lovely people. I went to school there for 4 years, after I graduated from the University of North Dakota, and I have a great, great many warm friends in the State of New York. However, I think even the two distinguished Senators from New York will agree with me that they can afford to divide up a little bit when it comes to members of the President's Cabinet, and that they should not have, from New York, six members of the President's Cabinet and leave North Dakota without any.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield at this time, Mr. President.

Mr. MAYBANK. I wish to agree with the Senator.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I think the two distinguished Senators from New York will agree with me that at least a Secretary of Agriculture or a Secretary of the Interior should come from North Dakota. So, next time, no matter whether a Democrat or a Republican is elected President of the United States—whichever it may be—I hope that some person from North Dakota will be placed in the President's Cabinet.

I may say, Mr. President, that I am not a candidate for one of those positions and would decline it if it were offered to me because I have the best job in the world right now—that of senior Senator from North Dakota.

However, I believe in North Dakota we have hundreds upon hundreds of men and some women who could very ably and very capably fill a position in the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

Mr. President, during these 61 years there has never been an ambassador for the United States who has been a resident of North Dakota. When we consider those who have served during that period of 61 years as ambassadors from the United States to all the countries in the world—I have not counted the number of those countries, but, of course, there are many of them—we find that there has never been a time when a man or a woman from North Dakota has been appointed to be an ambassador for the United States to one of the foreign countries.

Then we come to the matter of consuls. I have a dim recollection that years and years ago, when I was a little, tiny boy, the man who owned the largest newspaper in Fargo, N. Dak., Major Edwards, was appointed consul to Quebec. He is the only person from North Dakota ever to be appointed a consul.

Mr. President, the record shows what a great State North Dakota is.

North Dakota produces approximately 45 percent of the country's spring wheat, and its high protein content makes it premium quality. For a long time North Dakota was known as the Nation's breadbasket.

When it comes to durum wheat, North Dakota produces more than 90 percent of all the durum wheat that is produced in the United States.

The people of North Dakota are hard workers, honest, industrious people. In North Dakota we have more colleges and other educational institutions, believe it or not, than has the State of Iowa, which has three times the population that our State has. In North Dakota we have our Agricultural College; we have our State University; we have our Science School; we have six normal schools; we have a School of Forestry. Whenever North Dakota boys have gone to such colleges as Harvard, Yale, Columbia, or some of the other large colleges in other parts of the country, it is very unusual that those North Dakota boys are not either at the head of their class or very nearly at the head of their class.

North Dakota has produced about 15,000,000 bushels of flax annually. That production has been increased lately to almost 30,000,000 bushels.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield at this time, Mr. President. I shall be through in a little while.

Mr. President, North Dakota is first, among all the States of the United States, in respect to the production of barley; North Dakota produces about 20 percent of the Nation's barley.

In North Dakota we raise so much corn that when we plant it, we plant it in rows a mile long, or sometimes 2 miles long. Sometimes one row of corn is 1 mile, or 2 miles, or 3 miles long. I see in the Chamber at this time my distinguished friend, the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BENTON] who used to live in Montana. I know that my distinguished friend will bear me out when I say that when we travel in North Dakota in the summertime, we see rows of corn so long that we cannot see from one end of them to the other. North Dakota has become one of the great corn-producing States.

There is another thing which I wish to state at this time, Mr. President, namely, there is no State in the Union where communism will make less strides than in the State of North Dakota, because in North Dakota the overwhelming number of the people own their own homes. I am very proud of that fact. In North Dakota we have the family-type, family-size farms. The result is that the average man owns his own home. The same is true in the cities of North Dakota.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I decline to yield.

Mr. President, in addition to what I have stated, let me point out that in North Dakota we have a large acreage planted in certified seed potatoes. We furnish seed potatoes to every State in the Union, and we send them to every country in the world.

Mr. President, I am not going to say anything detrimental to any other State; but it is amazing to me to see some of the advertisements about potatoes. For example, a while ago I was in Chicago, and while there I went into a restaurant, where I saw a big sign advertising the potatoes which are said to come from a certain State; and the purpose of the advertisement was to urge people to buy that kind of potato. However, Mr. President, the seed from which those potatoes are raised comes from North Dakota.

Let us consider for a moment the production of turkeys. Mr. President, do you know that if you buy a North Dakota turkey, it is worth 10 cents a pound more than a turkey coming from any other State of the Union? Yet once in a while I see a turkey which comes from some other State, but is labeled as being a North Dakota turkey. However, investigation often shows that the bird never saw North Dakota, but someone simply bought that turkey in another State, and put on it a sign, "North Dakota turkey," in order to get the added price when it was sold.

AGREEMENT TO VOTE ON NOMINATIONS OF ANNA M. ROSENBERG AND STEPHEN J. SPINGARN

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, at this point will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

Mr. LANGER. For a question?

Mr. LUCAS. No; I wish the Senator to yield to me in order that I may propose a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. LANGER. Yes; I yield, if the matter to which the Senator refers will appear in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. LUCAS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator agree to a unanimous-consent proposal that the Senate vote on the Rosenberg and Spingarn nominations at, let us say, 12:30 p. m. tomorrow?

Mr. LANGER. At what time?

Mr. LUCAS. At 12:30 p. m. tomorrow.

Mr. LANGER. Yes, certainly.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, let me ask whether it will be possible for us to vote on the nominations tonight.

Mr. LUCAS. Perhaps so; I do not know.

At what time would the Senator from North Dakota say he would think we could vote on the nominations tonight?

Mr. LANGER. Honestly, Mr. President, I do not know. When I begin to talk about North Dakota, I go on and on and on. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUCAS. That is why I suggested that we agree to vote on the two nominations at 12:30 p. m. tomorrow.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Rosenberg and Spingarn nominations be voted on by the Senate at 12:30 p. m. tomorrow, one nomination to be voted on immediately following the other.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, that order has been entered, has it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

The agreement as reduced to writing is as follows:

Ordered, That on the calendar day of Thursday, December 21, 1950, at the hour of 12:30 o'clock p. m., the Senate proceed to vote, without further debate, upon the question of advising and consenting to the nomination of Anna M. Rosenberg, of New York, to be Assistant Secretary of Defense, and immediately thereafter, without further debate, proceed to vote upon the question of advising and consenting to the nomination of Stephen J. Spingarn, of New York, to be a Federal Trade Commissioner for the unexpired term of 7 years from September 26, 1946.

ANNA M. ROSENBERG

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Dakota will yield, I think this may be an appropriate time for me to make the statement to which I referred a while ago.

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, there is pending before us a nomination which has aroused widespread interest throughout the country. It has been the subject of one of the most exhaustive committee investigations undertaken in the past year.

The Armed Services Committee was good enough to permit me, although not a member of that committee, to be present as an observer during many of the sessions held on the nomination of Anna Rosenberg to be Assistant Secretary of Defense.

In one way it was shocking to me that an individual of such high and unquestioned repute, of such notable attainments, for whom so many people have vouched on the basis of intimate associations extending over two decades, should be subjected to the kind of ordeal which Mrs. Rosenberg has faced during the past 2 weeks.

On the other hand, I am deeply and favorably impressed by the minute care with which the Armed Services Committee went into the charges that were made—the scrupulous attention given to each piece of testimony, to each allegation, and each statement made before the committee. Hours upon hours were spent in hearing these charges and in examining into them, and following back over every possible trail which was indicated. No stone was left unturned; no charge was left unheard.

It is not my wish or prerogative to analyze the testimony given before the Armed Services Committee, nor the procedure followed by that committee. All I wish to say is that no nominee for public office has ever received a more microscopic examination of character and political background.

Of course, there were ugly undertones to this proceeding. The sources of some of the charges were motivated not by patriotic devotion, but by unpatriotic prejudices. But all that is now happily over. The committee has given Mrs. Rosenberg a clean bill of health.

Mrs. Rosenberg is a citizen of my State. I have known her both personally and professionally for a quarter of a century. She served her State in many official capacities during the years when I was Governor, and both before and after that. She achieved the reputation of being an eminent expert in labor-management problems, in labor relations, and in manpower problems generally.

In all the years that I have known her she has followed no narrow social doctrine or ideological cant. Her chief characteristic has been her complete openmindedness and receptiveness to facts. Her store of knowledge is amazing. Her administrative skill is of the highest. She has shown a great gift for improvisation and initiative. Her capacity for work is prodigious.

I assume it was for these reasons that Gen. George C. Marshall selected Mrs. Rosenberg to be one of his assistants to share the tremendous responsibility he now has for the defense of our country and of the free world.

Mrs. Rosenberg was a member, by my appointment, of the New York defense council when it was first established in 1941. She sat on that council for 5 years, until the end of the war. My successor, Governor Dewey, kept her in that position when the defense council became the war council. One of her colleagues of those days is my colleague today in the Senate, the senior Senator from New York [Mr. IVES], who was then majority leader of the New York State Assembly, and, by virtue of his position, a member of the defense council and then of the war council.

I can think of no one better equipped than Mrs. Rosenberg to occupy the post to which she has been named by the President. It is my belief that the United States Government is very fortunate, indeed, to have her services in this difficult and trying period. In this period of our history, we need the best and finest talents of the entire Nation in positions of governmental responsibility. The very survival of our Nation depends upon that.

That is why I cannot view without extreme regret the experience of Mrs. Rosenberg in suffering the attacks against her character, broadcast by radio and spread over the pages of the press. I do not think it will provide a very attractive precedent for others who are approached to serve, at personal sacrifice, in public capacities.

Of course, Mrs. Rosenberg's experience is not a new one. There have been similar ones in the recent past. I know that it is absolutely necessary that we exercise the most scrupulous care in the selection of persons for sensitive posts in the United States Government. Yet surely there is—there must be—a better way to exercise these precautions than by charges in the press and over the radio.

I hasten to add that the Armed Services Committee did its best, to my certain knowledge, to minimize the public character of the investigation. I have nothing but the highest praise for the conduct of that committee.

The Senate is going to confirm this nomination. I am pleased at that. I am sure that Mrs. Rosenberg will continue to be a great asset in the Defense Department, a great aid to General Marshall, and will make a vital contribution to the vast defense effort which lies ahead for all of us. I am proud to support her nomination, and to urge all my colleagues to do likewise. This fine lady is a great credit to her State, as she is to her country.

NOMINATION OF CHARLES E. WILSON TO BE DIRECTOR OF DEFENSE MOBILIZATION

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. LANGER. Certainly.

Mr. LUCAS. Charles E. Wilson, of New York, has been nominated by the President to be Director of Defense Mobilization. He wishes to take the oath of office in the morning, so that he can immediately get to work. I wonder whether we can confirm the nomination of Mr. Wilson and the others—it will take only a little time to do so—in order to accommodate them.

Mr. LANGER. I should like very much to have that done. The trouble is, Mr. President, that I stated that I would oppose action on any nomination until I had an opportunity to make my speech; and Mr. Wilson is one of those who come from New York.

Mr. LUCAS. Yes; he is.

Mr. LANGER. On the present executive calendar there are the names of three persons who come from New York.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, none of those whose names are on the present executive calendar come from South Carolina, I am sorry to say: and likewise my heart has bled because of the lack of nominations of residents of North Dakota.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, do I correctly understand that the Senator from South Carolina is going to ask that the nomination of Mr. Wilson be confirmed tonight?

Mr. MAYBANK. That is what I wanted to ask the Senator. I had hoped we might confirm Mr. Wilson's nomination so he could take the oath of office tomorrow morning. He is from New York. I am a poor South Carolinian, as the Senator is a poor North Dakotan, with no appointees on the list. I should like to see Mr. Wilson's nomination confirmed, so that he can be sworn in tomorrow morning.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator from New York will ask me to yield to him for that purpose, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. LEHMAN. Reserving the right to object—and I do not intend to object—may I ask the distinguished majority leader whether, in his request that we vote at 12:30, there will be any allowance of time for brief remarks with regard to the nominees? If not, I desire to ask unanimous consent to read into the RECORD tonight a brief statement which I have prepared regarding Mrs. Anna Rosenberg.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I shall wait until the distinguished Senator from North Dakota is through, and I shall then read the statement into the RECORD.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from North Dakota will yield.

Mr. LANGER. I will yield to my distinguished friend from New York now for the purpose stated. I should like to do that for my distinguished friend from New York.

Mr. LEHMAN. I will read it tomorrow.

Mr. MAYBANK. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Dakota whether it will be possible to have Mr. Wilson's nomination confirmed tonight, so he can be sworn in tomorrow?

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota indicated that, if the Senator from New York would request him to yield in order that the nomination of Mr. Wilson may be confirmed immediately, he would comply with the request.

Mr. LEHMAN. That is that the nomination be confirmed tonight?

Mr. MAYBANK. To be confirmed tonight, so he can be sworn in tomorrow morning.

Mr. LEHMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nomination of Mr. Charles E. Wilson to be Director of Defense Mobilization, and whose name appears on the calendar, be now confirmed, so that he may be sworn in tomorrow morning.

Mr. MAYBANK. Or so that he can be sworn in immediately.

Mr. LEHMAN. And at the same time, I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. LUCAS. I suggest the Senator propound one unanimous-consent request at a time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New York? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I have been trying to obtain recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has been recognized.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield? I thought the Chair said the unanimous-consent request had been granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. A unanimous-consent agreement on what?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On confirmation.

Mr. WHERRY. That is the point I am raising. I wanted to reserve the right to object, in order that I might find out what was going on.

Mr. LANGER. We are trying to get a square deal for the people of North Dakota.

Mr. WHERRY. Very well. Just a moment. To begin with, I am for the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Charles E. Wilson just as soon as we can confirm it. But I do not know the nature of the unanimous-consent agreement that has been entered into.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That was the subject of the unanimous consent agreement. It was also agreed that the Senate would vote on the nomination of Mrs. Rosenberg tomorrow at 12:30.

Mr. WHERRY. What about the rest of the nominations on the calendar? Are they to be confirmed en bloc?

Mr. LUCAS. We shall finish them tomorrow.

Mr. WHERRY. Then the unanimous consent is that we confirm the nomination of Charles E. Wilson tonight; is that correct?

Mr. MAYBANK. Yes, tonight.

Mr. LUCAS. Immediately.

Mr. WHERRY. That is the one thing we want to do tonight, if possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. WHERRY. This is a question of confirmation. I do not want to step on anyone's toes in the matter of a quorum call. Does a quorum call have to be waived?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that the rule does not require a quorum call under the circumstances.

Mr. WHERRY. I am glad to have in the RECORD the statement that a quorum call is not required by the rule, so no criticism can be made.

Mr. MAYBANK. I desire to say that the committee approved Mr. Wilson's nomination unanimously.

Mr. WHERRY. I am for Charles E. Wilson 1,000 percent. There is no argument about that.

Mr. MAYBANK. I, too am in favor of the confirmation of his nomination.

Mr. WHERRY. All I am trying to do is to keep within the requirements, for the benefit of Senators on this side who may feel that a quorum call should have been had.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised by the Parliamentarian that the rules do not require a quorum call under the circumstances.

Mr. LUCAS. I ask that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Wilson.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LUCAS. I thank the Senator from North Dakota for his courtesy and kindness in yielding at this particular time for the unanimous-consent requests.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield.

Mr. MAYBANK. I have the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I did not lose the floor. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. I certainly have the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WHERRY. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

Mr. WHERRY. I asked the Senator to yield to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. But he has not yielded.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LANGER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska, after which I shall yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. WHERRY. Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator from North Dakota, and also the majority leader, for their kindness in yielding, and for agreeing to the confirmation of Mr. Charles E. Wilson. I also desire to thank them for bringing about the unanimous-consent agreement to vote on the other two nominations.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I yield now to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MAYBANK. To my good friend from North Dakota I merely desire to repeat what the distinguished Senator from Nebraska said, and I thank the Senator for yielding. I also wish to thank the minority leader, because this matter was imperative.

Mr. WHERRY. The Senator thanks everyone.

Mr. MAYBANK. No, Mr. President. It was imperative that Mr. Wilson's nomination be confirmed tonight, so he could take office tomorrow. So I thank the Senator from North Dakota.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST CITIZENS OF NORTH DAKOTA IN APPOINTMENTS TO FEDERAL OFFICE

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the paragraphs on page 9692 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 90, part 7, dealing with the products of North Dakota, be inserted at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MASS PRODUCTION THROUGH MODERN MECHANIZED METHODS

Leading wheat State

North Dakota produces about 45 percent of the country's spring wheat and its high protein content makes it premium quality. Long termed the "Nation's breadbasket," North Dakota produces prodigiously.

First in durum

More than 90 percent of the durum grown in the United States comes from North Dakota to be made into seminola, macaroni, and to supply export needs. Durum wheat is grown efficiently in the land of the long furrow, ideally suited to modern mechanized equipment.

For linseed oil

North Dakota produces about 15,000,000 bushels of flax annually, making it one of the leading producers of flax, often judged the best in world competition at the International hay and grain show in Chicago. Flax is also coming into use as an edible food oil. Flax fiber is important commercially for making linen, paper, and insulation material.

First in barley

North Dakota produces about 20 percent of the Nation's barley, important as food for humans as well as livestock. The State is also a major source of high-quality malting barley used in the manufacture of malt beverages.

Mile-long corn rows

Development of sturdy hybrid seeds has increased production, while livestock demands have enlarged acreages as North Dakota progresses in diversification and stabilization. Northern grown seed from North Dakota is in strong demand.

A MAJORITY OWN THEIR OWN FARM HOMES

Home ownership

Many beautiful farm homes exemplify the pride of ownership, and a high percentage of North Dakotans own their own farms. Pictured is a modern farm home in the Sheyenne River Valley, where combined grain farming and balanced livestock production bring assured profits.

Profitable potatoes

North Dakota has a larger acreage of certified seed potatoes than any other State, and the production of seed for Southern States and Caribbean countries provides a $20,000,000 annual industry. Fine table stock is used in new dehydration plants supplying a wide market.

Sugar beets

Without irrigation or fertilization sugar beets with a content of 16 to 17 percent, yielding about 9 tons per acre, are produced in the Red River Valley, and 12 to 14 tons under irrigation in the Valley of the Yellowstone along the western border. Beet growing, now highly mechanized, is very profitable. It fits in rotation plans and aids in livestock feeding and fattening.

Soybeans

The magic material for plastics, high protein food products for man and beast, soy beans is a crop being rapidly expanded in North Dakota, with a soybean processing unit installed in the State mill and elevator at Grand Forks.

Tractor territory

North Dakota's level areas, great fields, free from stone, tend toward complete mechanized methods as indicated in the threshing scene above.

LIVESTOCK MANUFACTURES FOOD FROM FEED

Herds pedigreed find rich, ample feed

Uncounted thousands of bison fattened in days of old on the prairies whose rich, nutritious grasses now support registered herds of beef and dairy cattle, followed by quality sheep and premium hogs, while turkeys, poultry, and poultry products supply processing plants for year-round operation, farmers with ready cash and a splendid balance to agriculture, once devoted largely to the growing of cereal grains. Dried grama and bunch grass furnishes feed for livestock on the range even during winter months.

MANY MARKETS FOR NORTH DAKOTA FARMERS

Competition and cooperation

Competition is the life of trade and cooperation also plays an important part in the markets of North Dakota. The State offers a State-owned mill and elevator, in competition with independent flour mills, and cooperatively owned elevators operate in competition to individually owned grain houses—all of which works to make good markets for North Dakota farmers, who can sell all their products for cash at any season.

QUALITY PRODUCTS PROVIDE PROFITABLE INDUSTRIES

North Dakota turkeys

The special quality and flavor of North Dakota turkeys, North Dakota butter, North Dakota poultry, bring premiums on eastern markets. North Dakota pottery made from some of the world's finest ceramic clays sells readily in all States. The dry, healthful climate is ideal for the production of fine furs.

North Dakota honey

Water-white honey gathered by bees from sun-flooded fields of sweet clover has a taste and flavor which wins instant favor and is declared of supreme quality by honey connoisseurs over the Nation. More hours of sunshine allow the bees to work longer hours, store more honey per hive, a fact which brings apiaries here annually from distant States.

A WARM WELCOME TO AIR-CONDITIONED COMFORT

Gradually the romantic history of North Dakota, the unique beauty of its Badlands, of its 22 State parks, the compelling interest of restored prehistoric Indian village dwellings, its skyscraper capitol, its immense International Peace Garden, beauty spots, and other attractions—are making the State a touring objective.

For many years North Dakota's faster, shorter, better, cooler routes have been popular pathways to the Alps of America, the Nation's greatest scenic section, the Pacific Northwest. North Dakota provides the Main Street to the Yellowstone, the Broadway to Glacier, and the Appian Way to the other American and Canadian parks.

North Dakota's broad sweeps, the stillness of its Badlands, the Sunken Gardens of America, brings peace to the soul of the visitor. There is rest for the eyes in the beauty of the great green or golden seas of grain in mile-square checkerboards. Enlarged horizons, unmatched sunsets, and the great blue tent in which the stars are hung give a new sense of freedom to those escaping from congested confusion, who have broken into the open spaces to breathe ozone-filled air, to drink in the health-giving sunshine, and to be a part of nature itself.

North Dakota welcomes visitors to its healthful, zestful, restful climate. Visitourists are urged to linger in its sunshine, enjoy its hospitality, and to become relaxed and refreshed. Citizens are grateful to those hunters, fishermen, outdoor people who acknowledge North Dakota as a touring objective.

STATE HAS GREAT WEALTH OF NATURAL RESOURCES

More than 600,000,000,000 tons of lignite coal, enough for the needs of the Nation for 400 years, underlies 28,000 square miles in western North Dakota. If sold at only $1 a ton, it would pay the national debt twice over. Gasoline, plastics, various oils, acids, dyes, paints are made from lignite economically mined.

Lignite coal is briquetted into high-class fuel at Dickinson and Minot plants. New industrial uses of lignite for motor fuel, etc., are being worked out by United States Bureau of Mines engineers in North Dakota. Natural gas furnishes another cheap and efficient fuel. Lignite lends encouragement to new industries because of its economy.

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I am very happy to advise the Senate that I have just been informed that the executive department is going to give, almost immediately, very sympathetic consideration to the plight of North Dakota. Therefore, I shall not speak any further tonight. I want to see what will develop. Unless we get the sympathetic consideration of which I have just been assured, Mr. President, I am in duty bound to continue to oppose the confirmation of all nominations of heads of departments, ambassadors, and so forth. I am deeply appreciative of the fact that the executive department has notified me that the terrible discrimination which has existed against the State of North Dakota for 61 years—61 long, long years—is going to cease.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

RECESS

Mr. LANGER. Mr. President, I move that, in executive session, the Senate now stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in executive session, took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, December 21, 1950, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 20 (legislative day of November 27), 1950:

UNITED NATIONS

Mrs. Anna Eleanor Roosevelt, of New York, to be the representative of the United States of America on the Human Rights Commission of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations for a term of 3 years. (Reappointment.)

George P. Baker, of Massachusetts, to be the representative of the United States of America on the Transport and Communications Commission of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations for a term of 3 years. (Reappointment.)

IN THE NAVY

Rear Adm. Malcolm F. Schoeffel, United States Navy, to be Chief of the Bureau of Ordnance in the Department of the Navy for a term of 4 years.

Vice Adm. Lynde D. McCormick, United States Navy, to have the grade, rank, pay, and allowances of an admiral while serving as Vice Chief of Naval Operations.

Rear Adm. Albert G. Noble, United States Navy, to have the grade, rank, pay, and allowances of a vice admiral while serving as Chief of Naval Material in the Department of the Navy.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate, December 20 (legislative day of November 27), 1950:

DIRECTOR OF DEFENSE MOBILIZATION

Charles E. Wilson, of New York, to be Director of Defense Mobilization.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1950

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, who art always seeking to inspire and sustain us with a vivid sense of Thy presence and power, we pray that this assurance may be for all of us a here-and-now experience.

Grant that the thought of Thy divine sovereignty may guard us against doubt and fear as we strive to hold at bay the forces of tyranny and aggression that would enslave us.

Help us to bring our lives consciously and continuously into harmony with what Thou dost desire and command. In all our plans and purposes may we be impelled by pure and unselfish motives.

Give us a clearer understanding of our duty, not as a heavy burden or a drudgery, but as a devotion to a great cause. May we be loyal partners with all who are giving themselves so valiantly in order to secure the blessings of freedom for our own and succeeding generations.

Lift us by Thy grace above all the hazards and hardships of time's happenings into the blessedness of Thine own eternal peace.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Woodruff, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill and joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 9913. An act to prevent penalties and additions to tax in case of failure to meet requirements with respect to estimated tax by reason of increases imposed by the Revenue Act of 1950; and

H. J. Res. 554. Joint resolution amending section 3804 of the Internal Revenue Code.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the House of the following titles:

S. 3357. An act to prohibit transportation of gambling devices in interstate and foreign commerce; and

S. 4234. An act to promote the foreign policy and provide for the defense and general welfare of the United States by furnishing emergency relief assistance to Yugoslavia.

The message also announced that the Senate had adopted the following resolution (S. Res. 377):

Resolved, That the Secretary be, and he is hereby, directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 5051) for the relief of Mrs. Juan Antonio Rivera, Mrs. Raul Valle Antelo, Mrs. Jorge Diaz Romero, Mrs. Otto Resse, and Mrs. Hugo Soria, together with the Senate engrossed amendments thereto.

AGUA CALIENTE INDIAN RESERVATION

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H. R. 9272) to amend the act of October 5, 1949 (Public Law 332, 81st Cong.), so as to extend the time of permits covering lands located on the Agua Caliente Indian Reservation, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Line 8, after "1951", insert ": Provided, That this amendment shall not extend the duration of any permit which would, according to its own terms, expire on or before December 31, 1951."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BERNARD F. ELMERS

Mr. BYRNE of New York submitted a conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 4803) for the relief of Bernard F. Elmers.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HÉBERT (at the request of Mr. PASSMAN) was given permission to extend his remarks.

Mr. LANE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. PRICE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a newspaper article.

Mr. BOLLING asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a column by Lowell Mellett.

Mr. BIEMILLER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include newspaper articles.

Mr. JACOBS asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a letter and an answer to it.

Mr. O'SULLIVAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in three instances and include in each instance extraneous matter.

Mr. STOCKMAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include in one a resolution adopted unanimously by the Oregon Wheat Growers League last December 9, and in the other an address by the administrator of the Oregon Wheat Commission on Wheat and Our Foreign Policy.

Mr. JOHNSON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. BIEMILLER asked and was given permission to include extraneous matter in the remarks he expects to make under special order later in the day.

Mr. CLEVENGER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include an editorial from the Van Wert Times-Bulletin.

Mr. JENISON asked and was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances and include extraneous matter.

Mr. VURSELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks.

AMENDING AND EXTENDING CERTAIN PROVISIONS OF THE FIRST WAR POWERS ACT, 1941

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 9932) to amend and extend certain provisions of the First War Powers Act, 1941.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HALLECK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, this matter was first presented yesterday to the Committee on the Judiciary. I think there were certain representatives of the Department present, but no hearings as such were held. The gentleman can correct me if I am in error about that.

Mr. CELLER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HALLECK. This proposal contains two titles. The first has to do with power and authority granted to the President to provide for the redistribution of functions among executive agencies, and for numerous other powers in connection with that general subject, having to do with the agencies of the Government.

The second title has to do with the making of contracts of procurement in connection with the national defense.

From what I have been able to determine of the matter, there is no immediate urgency for any determination as to the matters contained in title I.

As a matter of fact the powers therein contained are extremely broad and have been the subject of considerable questions by many Members who have had a chance to look at it. My own view is that certainly the matters contained in title I should have more careful consideration before action is taken. The powers therein granted would certainly not be invoked before the first of the year anyway.

In respect to title II, if the proposal were to be limited to that, as far as I am personally concerned, I would not object to its consideration at this time. That has to do with the contract procurement matters. However, I think I should point out that in the brief examination which has been made of the matter by some Members here, and I might say by certain Members of the other body, question has been raised as to whether or not that title does not go too far insofar as it would repeal by implication, at least, as I understand it, rather carefully worked-out provisions of the Defense Procurement Act of 1948. So, Mr. Speaker, while all of us certainly want to cooperate in the expeditious consideration of measures necessary for the national defense, I do not seen how a unanimous-consent request can be granted for this measure as a whole containing these two titles in the light of the very limited consideration that have been given to it and having regard also to what I think is clearly a situation in which we could certainly take the time necessary to inquire more carefully into the provisions of title I at least.

Mr. CELLER. Of course the gentleman understands that these changes to be made in the War Powers Act are only temporary and are for the duration of the emergency which has been declared by the President.

Mr. HALLECK. Yes, I understand that, but I might say to the gentleman from New York that if he has any definite idea of how long this emergency is going to last, then he knows more than I do about it, and I think more than any other Member of the House of Representatives. It may be a matter of years. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the request embodying all these matters, and being as it is, I must object.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his right to object for a moment?

Mr. HALLECK. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. What is the gentleman's position on a unanimous-consent request that it be in order tomorrow to consider this bill with 1 or 2 hours of debate, to be divided equally between the majority and minority?

Mr. HALLECK. As a matter of fact the gentleman knows that if objection is made then the matter can go to the Committee on Rules and possibly have some further airing there, which I take it would probably be productive of some better understanding of what it is about. I would feel constrained to object to the unanimous consent for consideration of this bill tomorrow.

Mr. McCORMACK. I might say that the latter is very unusual.

Mr. HALLECK. It might be quite unusual, but we have been doing a few unusual things, I may suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts, in respect to the enactment of legislation quickly and expeditiously to meet the present emergency which is upon us. So I do not think it is quite fair to criticize those of us who feel obligated to suggest that the powers sought to be granted in title I at least are so broad that we might well take a look at them to see what they are, before we undertake to put them into law.

Mr. CELLER. Of course both Houses of the Congress can, by concurrent resolution, terminate these powers which we grant here at any time.

Mr. HALLECK. I recognize that. That has been in all of these War Powers Acts. Might I suggest to the gentleman from New York that even the inclusion of that provision of the act that it is only for the duration of the emergency would not justify us in rushing blindly into such a broad grant of authority and power as is here indicated. The matter should have more careful consideration.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. HALLECK. Yes, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Will you tell me where I can get a copy of the bill? I am told at the desk that they do not have any.

Mr. CELLER. The bill was filed yesterday.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Well, I cannot get a copy.

Mr. CELLER. I will be glad to give the gentleman a copy.

Mr. HALLECK. Of course, as I understand it, the bill reported by the committee is not the one that is really to be supported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]; that he has in mind to offer a complete substitute, a copy of which I have, which is a carbon copy of a typewritten page.

Mr. CELLER. That is a committee amendment. All it does is to reenact in haec verba the provisions of title I and title II of the War Powers Act.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE ACT OF 1950

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9798) to authorize a Federal civil-defense program, and for other purposes.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present, and

I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 244, nays 0, not voting 185, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The doors were opened.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9798) to authorize a Federal civil defense program, and for other purposes, with Mr. ROONEY in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM], and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] have 1 hour each. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM].

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DURHAM. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I like to keep the membership informed of any changes in the program, or anything that might be expected in relation to the program. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce yesterday voted and directed the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH] to call up the union-shop bill. I have conferred with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BECKWORTH], and, in accordance with the direction of his committee he has informed me that in pursuance of that direction he intends to call up that bill tomorrow; is that correct, may I inquire of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BECKWORTH. That is correct.

Mr. HALLECK. Can the gentleman from Texas tell us whether or not he is prepared to yield for the purpose of submitting amendments to the measure?

Mr. BECKWORTH. It is my understanding, from a very authoritative source, that once a Member in charge of a bill under the rule to be used, yields, he loses control of the measure itself, and although the committee has not had a chance to discuss this matter since I received the information, in the absence of any further direction from the committee I would not be disposed to yield.

Mr. HALLECK. The gentleman is acting chairman of the committee at the moment, is he not?

Mr. BECKWORTH. The gentleman is the acting chairman of the committee, insofar as this bill is concerned, but the gentleman is acting in accordance with the direction of the chairman of the committee, who has called the meetings concerning this bill from time to time.

Mr. HALLECK. Does the gentleman have it in mind to try to convene any further meeting of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce prior to taking up the matter tomorrow?

Mr. BECKWORTH. The gentleman has not had occasion to determine that. I might add, the gentleman will certainly be glad to talk to the other members of the committee, the members who had a part in the direction which has been spoken of, and determine what the committee would like to do in that connection.

Mr. McCORMACK. And that would be informal?

Mr. BECKWORTH. I do not say whether it would be informal or not. The chairman of the committee to whom I have referred could call the committee together.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is, it would not be the official action of the committee. The gentleman at the present time is under instructions from his committee, taken in a meeting which was formal and official, to call this bill up when recognized by the Speaker for this purpose and he advised me that he intended to call it up tomorrow. Under the rules he has control of the time, and if he yields he loses control of the floor. In accordance with the direction the gentleman has at the present time he intends to proceed and not yield for the purpose of offering amendments.

Mr. BECKWORTH. As of the present time, yes, I would say I have no authority to act otherwise at this time, keeping in mind the committee direction of which I have spoken.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. HALLECK. If I understand the parliamentary situation, the time for debate would not exceed 1 hour.

Mr. BECKWORTH. That is right.

Mr. HALLECK. As I understand, the gentleman says he does not propose to offer any amendments.

Mr. BECKWORTH. At the moment, I would not state that I propose to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM] is recognized.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, the Committee has before it today H. R. 9798, which is a bill to authorize the Federal civil defense program. This subject has been before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy for the better part of a year, during which time that committee held hearings and a good deal of ground work was done on this subject. This bill is an outgrowth of that study. When the bill was referred to the Armed Services Committee, the chairman appointed a special subcommittee, all of the members of which were also members of the Joint Atomic Energy Committee, so that the special subcommittee could have the value of the members' experience concerning this subject.

I want the Members to know that our committee held exhaustive hearings on this bill, and the bill before you now is the result of our hearings and studies on this subject.

Originally, the bill was not divided into titles and it was apparent that if it were not so divided and generally tightened up throughout, the Administrator would have powers which were entirely too far-reaching. The subcommittee, therefore, divided the bill into four titles, as follows: Organization, powers and duties, emergency authority, and general provisions.

The declaration of policy is stated in section 2 of the bill. I believe that declaration is clear for it states that the policy and intent of the Congress is to plan and provide for the protection of life and property from an enemy attack of any nature, and that the responsibility is to be shared between the States and the Federal Government. The committee next wrote into the bill several definitions which were deemed necessary in order that there would be no misinterpretation. You will note that we defined "attack," "civil defense," "organizational equipment," "materials," "facilities," "States," and the term "neighboring countries."

As I have stated, title I sets up the organization of a Federal Civil Defense Administration. At the head of this Administration there will be an Administrator appointed from civilian life by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. He will receive a salary of $17,500 per year, which is commensurate with the salaries paid other agency heads. Under the Administrator will be a Deputy Administrator, also appointed by the President, with confirmation of the Senate, but the deputy need not necessarily be a civilian. He will receive a salary of $16,000 per year.

Title II is the title dealing with powers and duties, and sets out the detailed functions of the Administrator. He will prepare national plans and programs and check on State plans and operations. He will review the civil defense activities of the several departments and agencies of the Federal Government, and coordinate them with each other and with the activities of the States and neighboring countries. The Administrator will look after civil defense communications and warnings, study and develop civil defense measures, including research, and conduct schools and training programs. He will also assist, encourage and review interstate compacts and the bill provides for the consent of Congress to these compacts. In subsection (h) on page 7 of the bill, the Administrator is given the authority to procure, construct, lease, transport, store, maintain, renovate, or distribute materials and facilities for civil defense. This was a very broad subsection, so you will note that the committee wrote in two provisions requiring the Administrator to report to the Congress. It was felt that this would be an adequate safeguard and would let the Congress keep a check on the Administrator.

Subsection (i) of this title is that subsection dealing with financial contributions to the States for civil defense purposes. The contributions will be matched by the States for organizational equipment and shelters or protective facilities, but no contributions will be made for State or local personnel and administrative expenses. The contributions will be worked on a formula which is stated in this subsection and will be apportioned among the States in the ratio which the urban population of the critical target areas in each State bears to the total urban population of the critical target areas in all the States.

Title III of the bill is the emergency authority. It is recognized that this title will give to the Administrator considerable power, but on the other hand, it must be realized that in the event of an enemy attack such powers will be absolutely necessary. To implement this section the President must declare a national emergency for civil defense purposes and thereafter the President may direct any Federal department or agency to provide their personnel, materials and facilities to the Administrator, or emergency shelter, by construction or otherwise, and authority to make emergency repairs and temporary replacements of communications, hospitals, utilities, transportation facilities, or public facilities of States or their political subdivisions damaged or destroyed by enemy attack. During the emergency the Administrator is authorized to exercise this authority without regard to several laws enumerated in the bill, which mainly have to do with receiving bids on purchases, advertising for bids, and so forth. During the emergency the Administrator may provide financial assistance for temporary relief or aid of civilians, and he will coordinate and direct the relief activities of the various departments and agencies of the United States.

Title IV of the bill contains the general provisions concerning personnel, the establishment of the United States Civilian Defense Corps, a provision concerning printing, a provision giving the Administrator the authority to prescribe rules and regulations, security provisions and another section concerning a report to the Congress. This report would be submitted annually and would cover expenditures, contributions, work and accomplishments of the administration.

Generally speaking, that is what is in the bill. I think the Armed Services Committee has reported a very good civil defense bill. The legislation has been coordinated with other interested governmental agencies and, in principle, they all endorse this legislation. The Council of Mayors and the Council of State Governments also endorse the legislation. The bill was cleared by the Bureau of the Budget and the President has asked that civil defense legislation be given high priority by the Congress.

The fiscal effects of the bill are such that an expenditure of $3,100,000,000 is entailed, for the program, over a 3-year period. It should be noted that approximately one-half of this will be contributed by the States, leaving $1,600,000,000 to be contributed by the Federal Government.

COMMENTS ON H. R. 9798

Section 201 (a): The starting point of civil defense by the Administrator is the preparing of plans and programs. For several years considerable work has been carried on in this field as evidenced by the Hopley report and the United States civil defense. Continual work is required in considering and revising such plans and programs and it is definitely one of the continuing functions of the Administrator.

As a part of such plans and programs, consideration will be given to the planning for plant protection. In large part, other Government agencies will handle the internal security of plants most concerned with national defense and the Administrator will be most interested in the civil defense plans of other plants. Likewise, the evacuation and reception of the civilian population is another example of civil defense planning.

In preparing such plans it is contemplated that the Administrator will build on the plans and programs previously developed by NSRB. It is believed Congress should, in effect, give recognition to this previous work and permit a continuity to be maintained.

The subsection also provides that the Administrator shall "sponsor and direct" such plans. The dictionary definition of "sponsor" as used herein is "one who assumes responsibility for some other person and thing." The Administrator is, of course, responsible for the civil defense plans and programs. The dictionary definition again for "direct" as used herein is to "cause a (person or thing) to turn, move, point out or follow a course." As applied to plans and programs the phrase indicates the Administrator will assume responsibility for the same and will point out the course civil defense should follow.

To give added authority to need for complete and accurate civil defense information, the Administrator is also authorized to obtain reports on the State plans and operations for civil defense. This added authority will more readily enable the Administrator to obtain the necessary information. The Administrator will, in effect, run a clearing house for civil defense information.

Section 201 (b): In order to assemble at one point information as to the civil defense activities of the Federal Government, the Administrator is authorized to review all of such activities of the several departments and agencies of the Federal Government. This would include, of course, the civil defense activities carried on by the Atomic Energy Commission and the Department of Defense. In order to prevent the ignoring, duplication, or undue delay of different civil defense items or projects, the Administrator is authorized to bring the activities of such agencies with respect to civil defense into an accord or common action with each other and with the civil defense activities of the States and neighboring countries. In other words the activities will be coordinated.

COMMUNICATIONS

Section 201 (c): Civil Defense Communications will consist of two branches: (a) The alerting system; (b) the message-handling system.

Both systems will be designed to operate with both wire and radio equipment in order to make these systems invulnerable, if possible.

The alerting system, $30,451,500: The alerting system transmits air raid warnings from the air defense command to civil defense authorities in the various States.

The air defense command, by means of its radar equipment and its ground observer system, obtains information of approaching enemy aircraft. This information is sent to the air defense control center and from this point is fanned out to civil defense authorities in the nearby States. The air defense command is completing 11 of these control centers throughout the United States.

Two types of warnings are presently disseminated by officials in the air defense control centers. The first warning is known as the yellow alert. It is sent out when approaching enemy aircraft are first detected, and while it is still impossible for the air defense command to predict what city or cities might be the ultimate targets. In effect, the yellow alert means possibility of an attack.

Inasmuch as the yellow alert is sent to a wide area by the air defense control center, it is essential that it be kept confidential, since otherwise this Nation's productive capacity could be seriously impaired if the public were informed of the presence of such an alert. This confidential yellow alert is sent to key civil defense officials, to governors of States, to police and fire chiefs, and so forth, who upon its receipt begin to mobilize their protective personnel.

By way of example, if we suppose that a flight of unidentified aircraft is detected 200 miles out in the Atlantic on a line extending east from New York City, in all probability a yellow alert would be sent to key point warning centers in every seaboard State between Maine and Virginia. When, however, it was determined that the flight was definitely heading toward New York City, the red alert would be sent to that city, whereas Boston, Baltimore and Washington would be given the all clear signal.

The red alert is the public warning indicating imminent danger of air attack. This warning also originates in the air defense control centers and goes to the same key point warning centers to which the yellow alert is directed. Upon receipt of the red alert in any city, the sirens are immediately put into action and the public is warned of the approaching danger.

The air raid alerting system depends primarily on telephone circuits running between the air defense control centers and the various key point warning centers in the various States.

To back this system up with radio linkage, it is proposed to make full use of the broadcasting stations in this country. Inasmuch as it is desired to retain the confidential aspect of the yellow alert, some device must be employed to make the broadcasting stations activate special receivers owned by key civil defense officials but, at the same time, to prevent the receivers in general use by the public from picking up the information. This can be easily done by transmitting subaudible tones over the broadcasting stations. These subaudible tones are not detected by the general public but they cause a bell to ring and a light to flash on the special alert receivers in the possession of the key civil defense personnel.

In essence, the alerting system can be classed as a one-way communications system since the whole service rendered is warning the public of impending air raid. There is no requirement for replies returning from the public to any of the air defense control centers.

The message-handling system, $1,630,000 to be spent outright by the Federal Government plus $8,185,000 to be spent by the Federal Government as a counterpart to a similar expenditure made by the States: The message-handling system is designed as a two-way communications system. Telephone circuits are the backbone of this system but experience has shown that the telephone system is vulnerable to bombing attacks. For this reason and also for the reason that the telephone system is not able to handle all the traffic connected with a major disaster such as bombing, it has been decided to augment the telephone system with radio facilities.

In most municipalities the fire and police departments already have radio systems which can be used for their respective services in event of any emergency. Some augmentation of these radio facilities is necessary in some cities and States, and this augmentation is contemplated in the proposed budget.

In addition to the fire and police radio systems which will be utilized to their full capacity in the fire and police activities attendant upon a disaster, two-way radio facilities must be provided for rescue workers, medical teams, demolition squads, air-raid wardens, etc. It is proposed to use the portable and mobile radio facilities of American radio amateurs in performing this communications service, and to augment such equipment in target areas wherever deemed necessary.

It is further proposed that mobile facsimile transmitting and receiving equipment be made available for each major target city so that maps of city streets showing road blocks, pipeline breaks, fire areas, etc., may be transmitted by radio from the scene of the disaster to the local control center.

The communications system in any community is centered in the local control center which will be equipped with both telephone and radio communications equipment.

In addition to being the focal point for communications to and from fire, police, wardens, rescue, medical, and demolition teams, the control center is also utilized to summon assistance from other communities, from the State, or from the Federal Regional Civil Defense supply depots. An extension of this radio and telephone system will provide communications between the regional offices of the Federal Civil Defense Administration and the National Office of that Administration.

In every community, the two-way message-handling system described above will be augmented by a one-way service provided by the existing broadcasting stations. These stations will be utilized to train the public in civil defense procedures before any attacks are made. As described above, the broadcasting stations will also play an important part in backstopping the alerting system. Furthermore, the broadcasting stations will be utilized after the air raids have passed, as a means of disseminating advice to the citizens, and as a means of reuniting members of families. In this way the full possibilities of our present broadcasting system can be utilized to best advantage, and at the same time two-way mobile and portable radio equipment which can be taken directly to the scene of the disaster will be used when needed.

Section 201 (d): The Administrator would be expected to carry on research to afford adequate protection of life and property by developing the best methods of treating the effects of attacks by atomic, radiological, chemical, bacteriological, biological, or other weapons or processes. Under the coordination referred to in subsection (b), the Administrator would naturally utilize the agencies best qualified to conduct such research and would avoid duplication. In addition, the Administrator would develop adequate civilian shelter designs and also materials for protective covering. A further necessity is the need for developing equipment for facilities and effecting the standardization thereof to aid in meeting enemy attacks. Examples of the types of research now contemplated are the following:

First. Developing communal and family types of protective shelters.

Second. Development and testing of equipment for civil defense control centers.

Third. Development of public warning devices.

Other research projects would be developed for civil defense as deemed necessary. It is not contemplated that the Administrator will acquire or construct research laboratories but will utilize existing facilities. There will not be a large Federal research staff. Virtually all research will be accomplished by assignment or contract. This research authority is contemplated as a Federal program and the cost over a 3-year period is estimated at $3,000,000.

Section 201 (e): An important phase of civil defense is the training of professional workers and volunteers in the best methods of organizing civil defense and in the operations and techniques of civil defense. These techniques are considered as the method or details of procedure essential to the expertness of civil defense. It is contemplated now that the Administrator will establish one national staff college and also a minimum of three technical training schools. The Administrator would expect to train only the top civil defense officials and training supervisors designated by the States or the political subdivisions thereof. Such schools might be operated under contract or possibly organized and operated by the Administrator. It may be necessary to provide subsistence and quarters for the trainees and instructors on a reimbursable basis. Each class at the staff college will average about 50 students and will extend over about 5 weeks. The college staff will comprise about seven instructors. Each training school will handle about 125 students in each class and each course will extend over about 3 weeks. Shorter courses will also be given at these schools. The expenditure over a period of 3 years is estimated at about $10,000,000.

The Federal training program will include civil defense instruction in the curricula of schools and colleges; the provision of audio-visual aids and other training materials; on-the-spot institutes to assist State and local planners and administrators in the development of their civil defense programs; provision of tests to achieve standardization; and assistance in development of exercises to test civil defense planning, organization, and operations at the local, State, and regional levels.

It is not planned that the Federal Government will underwrite the cost of travel, subsistence, or pay of students, other than Federal employees, while receiving civil defense training.

No land will be acquired and no buildings will be constructed for the purposes of this subsection.

Section 201 (f): Civil defense information must be made available to every citizen through all appropriate means of communication. The methods used to reach the established goals mentioned above may be divided into the following categories:

First. That designed for the general public to provide education in civil defense problems and methods and specific instruction in individual and group self-protection against weapons which may be used against us.

Second. That designed to inform the general public on the progress of civil defense organization.

Third. That designed to teach, orient, or increase and maintain the morale of civil defense volunteer workers.

Fourth. That designed to provide teaching and study information for those who will instruct civil defense workers.

Fifth. That designed to keep the various States, and through them the political subdivisions, informed of Federal plans, programs, or policies.

"The appropriate means" refers to maximum use of existing Government and private media, including the press, magazine, special publications, manuals, handbooks, radio, television, motion-picture films, film strips, film slides, posters, exhibits, and such other means as may be available. Funds for distribution will be used only when no existing facilities are available. The costs of disseminating such information are a part of the administrative expenses of the administration and must be established each year in the light of the conditions then existing. The present budget contemplates the expenditure of $1,000,000 per year for disseminating civil defense information.

Section 201 (g): One of the basic concepts of civil defense is the rendering of mutual aid between the States. To form a legal basis for such aid it is recommended that the States enter into interstate civil defense compacts and the Administrator would encourage the negotiation of such compacts and review the terms thereof in order to obtain a reasonable degree of similarity or uniformity in the terms and conditions of such compacts which are consistent with the national civil defense plans and programs. The Administrator would also assist and coordinate the activities under such compacts.

This subsection grants the consent of Congress to such compacts. The Administrator is further authorized to encourage reciprocal civil defense legislation by the States.

Section 201 (h): In order to acquire stockpiles and also to acquire facilities necessary in the connection with civil defense, the Administrator is authorized to deal in materials and facilities as defined in the act which are needed to prepare for or meet enemy attacks. Real property needed by the Administrator might be acquired by negotiation and immediate possession could be obtained with the right to make improvements prior to the clearance of title by the Attorney General. Facilities could be constructed or renovated and may be leased as well as procured. The powers also relate to real property and are in broad terms since the exact situation confronting the Administrator at this time of exercising such powers is not known. Quarterly reports would be delivered to the Armed Services Committee under this subsection covering all property acquisitions under this subsection. The cost of the stockpiling program over a period of 3 years is estimated at $400,000,000. The costs of acquring any real property are included in other estimates under the bill.

Section 201 (i): The Administrator may make financial contributions to the States for civil defense purposes. Such contributions may include the procurement, construction, lease, or renovating of materials and facilities considered necessary to prepare for or meet enemy attacks. Certain limitations are imposed on the contributions, in that no contributions may be made for State or local personnel and administrative expenses, or for items of personal equipment for State or local workers, or for the procurement of land. Contributions for organizational equipment shall be equally matched by the States. Such equipment would be peculiar to civil defense and of a type that must be in place at time of disaster, that is, fire-fighting equipment, portable pipe and fitting, service trucks, vehicle fitments for litters. Contributions for shelters are to be apportioned among the States "in the ratio which the urban population of the critical target areas (as determined by the Administrator) in each State, at the time of the determination, bears to the total urban population of the critical target areas of all the States." This formula follows to some extent previous legislative enactments governing contributions to the States. The apportionment on the basis of the critical target areas is designed to render aid to the States where the need is considered greatest. If a State fails to match the funds apportioned, such funds may be reallocated. The section further excludes from the contributions of the States the value of any land. Further, it contains sanctions in the event there is reasonable evidence of the misuse of funds contributed by the Administrator. The estimated contributions by the Administrator over a period of 3 years is estimated at $100,000,000 for organizational equipment and $1,-$125,000,000 for shelters or protective facilities.

Section 201 (j): Materials acquired by the Administrator under title II can be disposed of only when found to be unnecessary or unsuitable for civil-defense purposes. In such case the materials shall be treated as excess property and handled in accordance with the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949.

Section 202: Under title II of the Defense Production Act of 1950 the President can requisition materials and facilities for national defense or defense. This section extends the authority to include "civil defense" within the term "national defense" or "defense."

Section 302: This provision is designed to make available the resources of the Federal Government during the period of the emergency. The decision to use these resources and the extent to which they shall be used is to be decided by the President. Resources include personnel, materials, and facilities.

This device is admittedly only for a very temporary period as the result of great stress. The authority is similar to that conferred in time of disaster by Public Law 875, Eighty-first Congress.

Section 303 (a): The emergency authority herein contained can be exercised without regard to the limitations of existing laws. The laws cited relate to facilities and materials and briefly are as follows:

Fortieth United States Code, section 278a: Lease of buildings to Government--maximum rental shall not exceed 15 percent of fair market value, and so forth.

Forty-first United States Code, section 5: All purchases and contracts for supplies and purchases or services must be advertised.

Fortieth United States Code, section 259: No money shall be paid for a site for a public building in excess of amount appropriated.

Fortieth United States Code, page 267: Restrictions on buildings; approval of sketch plans; limit of cost.

The Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949 contains the general authority and limitations relating to the procurement of personal property.

The foregoing limitations may be varied to expedite and aid in the procurement of materials and facilities.

Section 303 (b): This subsection confers broad authority on the Administrator during an emergency in connection with the transactions for the disposal of materials. Primarily this authority will be used to make available materials which have been stockpiled in the regional areas. Depending on the severity of the attack the Administrator might sell at cost or perhaps market value. With widespread and continued attacks the Administrator might deliver the materials without compensation. Deliveries would be made to or through the States.

The disposal could be made without regard to any limitation of existing law. The provisions of the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended, could be waived. This means the property would not be classed as excess or surplus.

The transactions would be made for civil defense. While the term is broad it seems clear that the materials would be used almost entirely in carrying out the measures cited in (c) of the civil-defense definition, namely, welfare, emergency medical, health and related services, rescue, and the like.

Under no circumstances could the Administrator generally go into a wholesale or retail business and his activities would be determined in good part by the extent of the damage.

Section 401 (a): It is estimated that the Federal Civil Defense Administration will require a maximum staff of 3,000 employees by June 30, 1952, at which time employment should level off. This estimate is based on staffing a national office and 13 regional offices.

Section 401 (b): It is not possible to estimate the number of part-time consultants or advisory committees which will be required at this time. Naturally, during the formulative phases of the program, consultants will be used extensively. At the present time we are using the services of six consultants on a part-time basis.

Section 401 (c): It is planned to establish 13 regional office areas to conform with the recently approved plan for regional areas. Advisory committees will be appointed when they are considered necessary. However, it is not expected that these committees will be required extensively.

The United States Civil Defense Corps is designed to be established and operated on a local level under the direction of the State. Generally, this corps would be composed of units and each unit would represent a protective service, although some administrative units might be included. Examples of the units are: Rescue, auxiliary police, auxiliary firemen, air-raid warnings, medical, drivers, welfare, transportation. Each unit would have insignia bearing its identification which would be the same throughout the United States. The training procedures would also be uniform to permit the ready interchange of units.

The corps would not conflict or override any of the duties of the State Guard and the personnel of the Guard would not be included in any of the services. A large number of the members would consist of women.

Through the corps the Administrator hopes to build up a morale which could permit the onerous duties of civil defense to be carried out in a more efficient manner and with a greater degree of discipline.

While the corps has the name "United States" it is not intended in any way that the members by reason of such membership would be employees or appointees of the United States. The members would be under the direction of control of the local or State leaders.

Federal Civil Defense employees will not be members.

Section 402: The President may issue regulations governing the authority granted above under subsection 8 (b), and the President may also provide by regulation for the exemption of persons employed or whose services are utilized under the authority of said subsections from the operation of certain sections of the Criminal Code. Regulations similar to those contemplated by this section have been issued in Executive Order 10182 of November 21, 1950, under the Defense Production Act of 1950 and the section contemplates the uniform application of such regulations to the administration.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. Chairman, one of the things a man in politics, especially if he is a Member of Congress, painfully learns is that very often he has to do things which he does not like or want to do. I do not like this legislation that delegates such broad, sweeping powers to any particular individual. I think it is fraught with considerable danger, but I am fearful that it would be more dangerous not to pass this bill or legislation similar to it. The big question is not "Can we afford it," but "Can we afford not to do it." We are in a desperate race against time. The hour is late and we must act now. I do not like castor oil but sometimes I am forced to take it, and many of the members of our committee, on both sides, I think, realize that unless properly administered, the door could be opened to a lot of vicious boondoggling and waste under this measure. Money could be spent where the votes are most needed. I do not think that will happen as long as our former colleague, who served in this body, and also served as Governor of Florida, remains as Administrator. But, of course, we are not guaranteed that Millard Caldwell will always be the Administrator. He has had both legislative and executive experience. I might say that he is appointed for no specified time; no particular termination to the tenure of his office or even to the expiration of this act. This is permanent legislation setting up an independent Federal civilian agency that is going to cost the taxpayers of the Nation during the next 3 years a little more than $3,100,000,000, on a 50–50 percent basis, the Federal Government contributing half of the money that is matched by the various States. We all know that very little, if anything, has been done about civilian defense in this country.

The thing that makes this legislation extremely difficult is that we are taking more or less a leap in the dark, but there is no way to avoid it. We have no yardstick; we have no standard; we have had very little experience ourselves to go by. We are entering a vast unknown and unexplored field. Naturally it is difficult to legislate on this matter.

I might say, however, that the men who have been living for weeks and months with this problem—particularly the very fine son of an illustrious father, Jerry Wadsworth, who knows more about the problem, I think, than any other particular individual, because he has devoted more study to it—have kept very vividly in mind in the preparation of this legislation the experiences which different nations in World War II had; in France, in Italy, particularly in Britain, and even measures that were taken by our defeated enemies, particularly in Germany and Japan.

Some sort of legislation of this nature is absolutely essential and necessary. The Senate Armed Services Committee beat us a little to the draw and reported out a similar bill last Saturday, and though members of our committee realize some of the dangers inherent and the weaknesses that you can find in this particular bill, we were convinced that it is the only thing we can do under present world conditions and therefore we reported it unanimously.

I imagine, at least $1,000,000,000 of the $3,000,000,000 that will be spent in the next 3 years will be spent on the construction of shelters, but it will also be necessary for the agency to prepare for the storage of food, medicines, and other supplies in case of an attack. Obviously the legislation is prepared to take care of a contemplated atomic attack, but we realize that due to the great advancement that has been made in recent years through science and technology, there will be other types of assault. Modern mechanized warfare is a very complex thing.

This legislation is to protect the civilian population, particularly in the vital strategic centers; our arsenals to supply and equip ourselves from atomic attack, and also from chemical, bacteriological, and radiological warfare as well as sabotage.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. JONAS. Will the distinguished member of the committee explain a little more fully this 50-50 arrangement? Assuming a State was to enter into negotiations about obtaining Federal aid, what mechanics would it have to follow according to the terms of the bill?

Mr. SHORT. Very broad powers are granted to the Administrator. After an attack actually comes, I am not so sure that he does not have more power than the President of the United States. He could confiscate land and property of any kind. No doubt the Administrator will work with the mayors of our different cities as well as the governors and local people of the various States in the letting of these contracts.

Mr. JONAS. This bill provides for erecting bomb shelters?

Mr. SHORT. Yes, and for negotiating contracts.

Mr. JONAS. That would be preliminary to any actual attack. With whom do we have these negotiations?

Mr. SHORT. Like all Gaul, this bill is divided into three parts. The first stage is to prepare against an attack of any kind. The second is to take care of the destruction and panic that comes with an attack. The third stage, of course, is for relief after an attack has been made.

Gentlemen, this is a new field. It is uncharted. We had to grant very broad powers to the Administrator. He thought perhaps we wrote in too many restrictions. I do not think we did write in too many. The original bill was too broad and indefinite. We have safeguards in the legislation, due to the very splendid work of our exceptionally able chairman the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], and the very fine help that was given him by the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DURHAM], together with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY], the gentleman from New York [Mr. COLE], and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ELSTON]. I want at this point to express my appreciation for the thorough study and the much thought and energy that was given to this problem. I almost overlooked my friend the gentleman from Illinois, [MEL PRICE]. He was there. Our professional staff member, Mr. Ducander, was most helpful. I just sat in on the sidelines more or less myself. I did the best I could, I contributed very little to it. except I did get them to increase the penalty for unlawfully wearing the insignia. During an atomic attack you have a wonderful opportunity to practice sabotage. We had a little, puny, insignificant penalty of a $250 fine and 6 months' imprisonment. I thought we should make it at least commensurate with the penalty that one suffers for impersonating an officer, wearing a uniform, so we wrote in a provision making the penalty a $1,000 fine and a year's imprisonment for wearing insignia unlawfully.

Mr. JONAS. We do not have any actual facts, and I assume the committee will concede there was not any actual evidence before the committee?

Mr. SHORT. That is right to a certain extent but I repeat we have never faced this situation before.

Mr. JONAS. Anybody that has the bomb is in position to come over here with a bomb that is comparable to the one we are planning on. Nobody has seen an enemy country work a bomb or the mechanics of it or put one into effect?

Mr. SHORT. The sky is a two-way highway.

Mr. JONAS. That is right.

Mr. SHORT. They can come over here and we can go over there. We must always bear that in mind. We can attack but we also must defend.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I am astounded and amazed at the gentleman's statement that the sky is a two-way highway. Up until this time I have always been told that Mr. Stalin could bomb us but that we were helpless. Where did the gentleman get the idea we could do anything? I think the gentleman is right, but I just wondered when that was discovered.

Mr. SHORT. I would not dare to say just what I feel in my heart. I can truthfully say that never in all my life have I been so worried and disturbed as I am at this particular moment. I just hope there will be no attack. Perhaps it is a vain hope, but it is a very fervent prayer, I can assure the gentleman of that.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. In the press I noticed either yesterday or this morning a statement that here in Washington we were preparing at Griffith Stadium to feed the people of Washington in case of attack upon the city. Do you know of anything along that line? Is that part of the program?

Mr. SHORT. I certainly think you should consider every contingency and every possibility, but it is impossible for me, with my lack of prophetic vision which is not nearly as great as that of the gentleman from Michigan to predict or look into the future and tell exactly what would happen in the case of attack. I do not think it is ridiculous. I do not think that is a ridiculous idea at all. Of course, I can not solve the imponderables.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Is it one of the purposes of this bill, the primary purpose, I might say, to provide a sort of city of refuge for folks in government, including Congressmen and Senators?

Mr. SHORT. It is to take care of you and me, both; yes. It is to take care of you and me. Every American is worthy of protection and care.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. I can see that that is one reason why some people support it. My idea was that it might be better to do something for the fellows over there, and that you and I take our chances. It would not be any great loss if one or the other, or both of us were hurt here.

Mr. SHORT. I am sure that anyone who has seen the severe damage from bombing in World War II, not only in England and Germany and Japan, but the countries that they went through, is convinced that the boys on the battlelines are very much concerned about the safety of their families and their people back home. They are very much concerned.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. The gentleman just said that in 2 or 3 years it would require about $3,000,000,000. We know that during the last war when they had these black-outs, they equipped tens of thousands with steel helmets, buckets of sand, and a lantern and pick, and I am wondering whether or not in supplying these things if they would not be competing against the Army for materials. Is that not true to the extent of at least several billions of dollars, especially when we have a shortage now? Would they not come in and say, "Here is the bill."

Mr. SHORT. I can but will not elaborate on it. I do not think it is necessary to elaborate on this, except to remind the gentleman from Illinois that when you are in war today it is total warfare. It is not only war between armies on the battlefield, but it is war between total populations and often the civilian population suffers first and suffers the most. That is the situation in modern warfare today.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Would not they be competing with the Armed Forces and taking away strategic materials from our boys who would be doing the actual fighting? That is what bothers me.

Mr. SHORT. Of course you have to prepare for total war, and you have to be strong on every front. But the battle front can never be stronger than the home front. You have to defend your industries. It was our industrial might, huge output, and great productive capacity which won World War II. Everybody knows that. It saved the battle of Britain, and it saved the battle of Stalingrad.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Is it not a fact that Mr. Wilson, now the top mobilizer in the country, and the national production authority, will determine the priority of this as well as everything else, and if it is determined that this ought to have a priority either before or after military priorities it will get it, and if not, it will not?

Mr. SHORT. Of course the Administrator of this Federal Civil Defense will work in close conjunction, cooperation, and collaboration with the Munitions Board, the National Security Resources Board, and all other Government agencies involved.

Mr. JAVITS. Is it not a fact that Mr. Wilson has no authority superior to him, other than the President of the United States, over all these fellows, including this one? Should not the record show that?

Mr. SHORT. In the case of an atomic attack the power of the Administrator would be almost unlimited.

Mr. JAVITS. Section 301 says that in the event of an enemy attack or in anticipation of imminent enemy attack, the President may proclaim a national emergency for civil defense purposes.

Should not the RECORD show that that is a special declaration of a special type of emergency, and that this language does not mean that the President has already acted, because we know he has already declared a national emergency?

Mr. DURHAM. I think if the gentleman will read the definition of what an attack is, he will see.

Mr. JAVITS. Is that not a fact? I think the RECORD should show that this is a fact, that this is a different type of emergency from what the President has already declared.

Mr. DURHAM. I think that is definitely understood.

Mr. SHORT. I am glad the gentleman made his statement for the RECORD.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHORT. Oh, I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. As I understand this bill and the gentleman's very lucid explanation of it, the man in charge of our civilian defense, after this bill becomes law, will have authority to determine which cities or communities in America may be given bomb shelters and which may not. Is that correct?

Mr. SHORT. Yes. They have to prove the need and necessity. And they could spend the money in the areas where votes are most needed.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. In other words, the Administrator shall determine, on the need and necessity, what community shall have it and what shall not; he shall determine which citizens will be entitled to a chance for their lives and which shall not. Can the gentleman from Missouri, learned and able as he is, conceive in his mind some of the difficulties that Members of Congress may have from their constituents in case a community in your district or my district is left out of the program?

Mr. SHORT. I assure the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ALLEN] that I have had the same feelings as both of the gentlemen entertain. I know that the Administrator is a good, loyal Florida Democrat, and I also know that, above everything else, he is a great American. I think he is going to do a good job.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. But I am serious about this.

Mr. SHORT. And that he will administer the law fairly and impartially. I am serious, too.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am asking a serious question. This legislation gives to one man the authority to determine what community will be given protection from a bomb attack and which community will not, and which group of citizens may have a bomb shelter available in case of attack and which will not.

Mr. SHORT. You must trust somebody.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that specific point?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. KILDAY. I call the gentleman's attention to page 29, beginning in line 4, where the bill sets out the formula which shall be followed by the Administrator in allocating these funds to the States and provides specifically that it shall be based upon the proportion of persons in that State, the proportion which the urban population bears to the total population.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Yes. I have read that, but he determines what the critical target areas may be.

Mr. SHORT. Well, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio, whom would you have determine that?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I want to say this to the gentleman——

Mr. SHORT. Do you not think it is better to set up an agency in a moment of calm, when we can think seriously?

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am afraid the gentleman is a little overdrawing the picture if he thinks this is a moment of calm in Washington, and if everyone is thinking in good true reason, then God spare us in a time of emergency.

Mr. SHORT. It is much better to write the law now than to wait until the emergency happens and a bomb drops.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. But there is another saying: "Do not act in haste and repent in leisure."

Mr. SHORT. We are not acting in haste.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I would like to ask another question.

Mr. SHORT. The hour is getting late.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I would like to ask another question because we all have responsibilities. Some of us do not occupy high positions, but we have some responsibilities as the elected representatives of the people. I have read with a great deal of interest, and I want the gentleman's comment, because I have such high respect for his judgment——

Mr. SHORT. Oh, I am sure.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I would like his comment on the provision on page 26—I presume you have read it very carefully—that we establish a college.

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. It provides a civilian defense college. Now, are we going to have to wait until degrees are conferred? We talk about time being short, that it is later than you think; now, are we going to have to wait until we establish that college, send people to the college and have them graduate and receive their degrees and then decide what is going to be done?

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, call it anything you will. We must have training and educational centers. I do not particularly like the name "college." Call it a college, call it a university, call it a school, call it anything you please; it is nothing to wonder about, it is simply a training place. There is one central college or training center established and there are training centers in the East, in the Midwest, and West.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I will read the language: One national civil defense college and three civil defense technical training schools.

Mr. SHORT. That is right. How in the world are you going to learn without going to college? One must study at some place. Call it anything you wish.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. DURHAM. Since the gentleman has raised the question of colleges, this is only a 5-week course. The term "college" does not mean much in the way that is ordinarily understood by the average individual American. This is just a 5-week course of training.

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. HARVEY. May I ask the gentleman about the estimated cost? As I recall, the gentleman referred to something approximating $3,000,000,000.

Mr. SHORT. Three billion one hundred million dollars over a 3-year period.

Mr. HARVEY. Over a 3-year period?

Mr. SHORT. That is right.

Mr. HARVEY. Is that Federal and State costs combined?

Mr. SHORT. That is the total cost, of which the Federal Government would contribute one-half to match money put up by the States or local agencies.

Mr. HARVEY. In other words, the amount to be appropriated from Federal funds will be a little over a billion and a half.

Mr. SHORT. Yes.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. CANFIELD. May I say to the gentleman that I happen to live in a prime target area, the New York metropolitan area where the people today are looking to the Federal Government for leadership in this problem. They are waiting for this day, and they want this bill enacted into law.

Mr. SHORT. They are a year ahead of us.

Mr. CANFIELD. They are waiting for the cue from Washington, all the governors of our eastern and western seaboard States. Is not that true?

Mr. SHORT. Yes; I think that is true.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. FORD. I wish to ask a question about this civil defense college and defense technical training schools. It is not expected that there will be any money spent for the purchase of property in the construction of buildings and facilities for these schools; I am sure that with the decrease in student enrollment in the various colleges throughout the country there will be adequate space for anything of this sort.

Mr. SHORT. The Administrator and the very able Acting Administrator, Mr. Jerry Wadsworth, who devoted so much study to this question, gave us full assurance that they would use existing facilities as far as possible.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Page 27 of the bill limits that; it prohibits it.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I am a graduate of this civil-defense college. I served in the service which gave the course, the Chemical Warfare Service, both as an officer and an instructor. I went to this school that is engaged in training people.

Let me say that the course is very simple. It teaches about the gases used and the training needed. Without this training it would prove to be much more costly and wasteful both of material and lives than if we failed to see that these people get the adequate and competent training that is provided for in this bill.

Mr. SHORT. I am glad the gentleman made that statement.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will it be necessary for the States to pass enabling legislation to go along with this bill?

Mr. SHORT. I think so. Any State that might be helped would have to match these funds. I am informed by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. CANFIELD] that about 20 States already have civil-defense laws.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the States which do not pass enabling legislation be recipients under this bill?

Mr. SHORT. No; they will not.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DURHAM. More than 50 percent of the States already have passed this legislation.

Mr. SHORT. Yes. That is my understanding.

Mr. DURHAM. And the balance of the State legislatures meet in January.

Mr. SHORT. Every country around the world that we visited has already taken these precautions. They have been working on this whole problem. We are far, far behind. I think the American public is far ahead of the Congress in this matter and they want some action. Now, not tomorrow.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Does not the gentleman from Missouri think that the Federal Government is putting a rather large amount of money into this thing? Are not the States and cities able to put up more money for the protection of their own people?

Mr. SHORT. Well, the problem is so big and so important that I think the contribution from the Federal Government is a reasonable and fair one. It is expensive, but if you will go down the Unter den Linden and see the total devastation, almost complete destruction, or if you will go to Yokohama and Tokyo, an area of 12,000,000 population where you have many square miles of desolated factories—Tokyo was turned into a bonfire, and you have only a forest of chimneys standing—then you would realize the necessity for this.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. I am wondering if the following figures might be interesting: You could double the personnel of every fire department in the United States and equip them for less than the cost of this bill. It is something we should consider.

Mr. SHORT. It is certainly going to take more than the fire departments in case of an atomic bomb attack. I assure the gentleman of that.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY].

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, there can be no question of the necessity for this legislation. I wish that I had the optimism of the gentleman from Illinois so I could in any wise believe, or even reasonably assume, that others do not have possession of the atom bomb or lack the ability to deliver the atom bomb to the United States. Unfortunately, I do not have that optimism in view of my service as a member of the Committe on the Armed Services and as a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

This legislation is necessary, and it is necessary now. As has been indicated, more than half of the States have passed enabling legislation. The other legislatures will meet in January so that those which have not passed their enabling legislation will be able to do so and will have before them what is expected of them on the basis of the Federal legislation.

Mr. Chairman, this is a most difficult bill to draw. Those of us who were here during the war are especially conscious of that fact. We recall some of the things that were done in the name of civil defense during the last war. We remember too well that dancers, artists, and actors were sheltered over here in the headquarters of the Civil Defense Agency in Washington, quite a contrast to the unpaid wholehearted cooperation received by the local communities from those who volunteered and worked for nothing.

This legislation has not been hastily considered. Hearings were held somewhat earlier. Nothing developed from it. If you will take the bill as it appears before you you will see that we have stricken out the requested provisions and we have rewritten the bill, and we have done so to avoid those things that any of us might fear because of our previous experience with a program of this type. We have thrown about the bill very strong safeguards in the preparatory period. If you will examine the bill which has been stricken you will find that the original request was for legislation practically waiving all restrictions and limitations so as to permit the Administrator to do as he pleased. We have been very circumspect in drawing the provisions in regard to preparation. Of course, you must go ahead with your emergency provisions, because in that preparatory period he must know what he is preparing to do. His duties must be set out and his powers and his authority when you come to what he can do in the emergency period or after an attack—and the word "attack" is defined, so as to be sure it is an attack on the United States—that he will then have very broad powers, and in the very nature of things he should have, although we do not need to worry too much about it, because in the event of a serious attack upon the United States justifying the exercise of those powers, even under this bill or without it, quite likely you would have a situation of martial law prevailing with all of the powers which are called for in that situation, so that after the bomb drops it is an entirely different thing.

Then the question of what he can do afterwards in connection with relief and rehabilitation comes up. We were much concerned about using the word "rehabilitation" for fear it would mean rehabilitating a community which had been struck as distinguished from immediate emergency relief, and we believe our language is adequate to confine it to immediate emergency relief.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. As I understand, and as the gentleman has explained it, this bill does give very broad powers to the Administrator. But, I notice that the bill in specific instances limits the power of the Administrator. On page 30 there is a limitation, starting in line 20. I am wondering whether it is a misprint, or if the committee has purposely placed that limitation in the bill, and if so, why? I want to read it:

> That the Administrator shall not approve any project which is of such sound value as reasonably to assure the retirement or repayment of the construction costs thereof within a period of not more than 50 years.

Is that a misprint?

Mr. KILDAY. That was very deliberately placed in the bill.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. That is so the Administrator cannot invest any of this civil defense money in any of these sound projects that are reasonably sure to repay the investment?

Mr. KILDAY. I do not care to be facetious.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I am not facetious; I am thoroughly concerned about this matter.

Mr. KILDAY. I refuse to yield further, but I will explain in detail the reason it is included and what it means.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I think we are entitled to an explanation of the meaning of this provision.

Mr. KILDAY. This provision is to prevent the Administrator from approving self-liquidating projects. That is because of the fact that in a very great many cities in the United States programs have been in existence and are now being developed or have been developed in the past for the construction of underground parking areas and garages. The mayor of Boston appeared. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ELSTON], if he takes time on the bill, will go into that in more detail, with reference to a program there. There were programs mentioned before the committee in San Francisco, I believe, and of course, each of us individually know of other programs. The purpose of this is to prevent tacking onto this bill, which is intended to be a real emergency measure, some project which was heretofore developed, whose primary purpose is either to relieve traffic and parking congestion in cities or to promote the interest of those—I do not say in the instances I mentioned it exists, but some of us know of instances in which persons have been promoting private business ventures, and we wanted to make sure that this did not apply and did not permit the use of any portion of this $3,000,000,000 in carrying out a self-liquidating program under the guise of an emergency, whereas it is not, in fact, an emergency.

I must say this: The bill as reported to the Senate by the Senate committee contains another provision in which it is stated in substance that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall have the power to either lend funds or purchase securities of the project certified by the Administrator of Civil Defense as being in the interest of civil defense, the only limitation, other than approval of the Administrator of Civil Defense, being that some $250,000,000 is the limit which can be outstanding at any one time.

This matter having come out of our committee in one form and out of the Senate committee in another, I feel very strongly that it is a matter that ought to go to conference to be worked out, because we in the committee have not had an opportunity to consider thoroughly the Reconstruction Finance Corporation provision, and the Senate committee has not had the opportunity to go over our viewpoint on it.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. I should like to know what is meant specifically by the language on page 40, which states:

> No such employee shall occupy any position determined by the Administrator to be of critical importance from the standpoint of national security until a full field investigation concerning such employee shall have been conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a report thereon shall have been evaluated by the Administrator.

Does evaluation mean that the Administrator must take the data submitted to him by the FBI and make a written statement, putting it in the individual's file, saying that he takes the responsibility for appointing this person even though some derogatory information regarding the person may have been in the FBI report?

The reason I ask this question is that several times in the past persons have been given positions of critical importance in various agencies after derogatory information had been submitted by the FBI. Then we never could find out who had made the decision to employ or appoint the man despite the derogatory information.

Mr. KILDAY. This is intended to include the provision which now applies to the Atomic Energy Commission. I believe the gentleman is informed that the FBI will report the results of its investigation without any determination as to whether the individual shall be employed or shall not be employed. That decision is up to the Administrator.

Mr. JUDD. Does the Administrator have to make a written statement, and put it in the file, that he takes the responsibility for employing or appointing the individual?

Mr. KILDAY. I am not positive of that.

Mr. JUDD. It ought to be in the law. The reason I brought this up now is to get it into the RECORD that we want to be able in fact to fix the responsibility for employing any persons regarding whom there is derogatory material.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PRICE. The mere fact that the Administrator appoints him after a report is made by the FBI would indicate he takes the responsibility.

Mr. KILDAY. Of course, this is different from some provisions in that the responsibility is placed directly on the Administrator. It being an administrative detail, I think it is one as to which the Administrator, to protect himself, should provide procedures.

Mr. JUDD. He cannot rule on every one of the thousands of employees, and it is important for us to know who overrules the derogatory information. We have had this situation before.

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SHELLEY. I agree with the decision as to financing self-liquidating projects, but has the committee allowed any leeway for the Administrator to set up a formula by which portions of these underground garages might be set aside and used as civil defense bomb shelters?

Mr. KILDAY. The idea of bomb shelters must not be overemphasized. It is not the intention nor is this money available to go into all the cities and every portion of the cities to build bomb shelters. The vast majority of that work will be in connection with existing buildings, basements, inner portions, and things of that kind, to strengthen those particular portions of buildings and make them adaptable as shelters. It is not the idea to put all over Washington, say, underground shelters.

As to the specific question here, in connection with what I understand to be the situation as to San Francisco there in front of the St. Francis Hotel, that was a self-liquidating project built quite some time ago. Whether that would prevent it from securing funds for strengthening, that is a borderline case.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. In his October 5, 1949, directive to the States and municipalities of our country, Dr. Steelman urged them to go ahead with legislation and plans. Will those States and cities which have gone ahead and perfected plans for defense be eligible for Federal contributions under this law? In other words, will the far-sighted States and cities that have already acted be eligible for Federal contribution under this law?

Mr. KILDAY. I would have to refer the gentleman to the chairman of the subcommittee. I am not clear on that point at the moment myself.

Mr. DURHAM. I should think what they have already expended would be entirely up to the Administrator to determine what proportionate share he would recognize as being necessary for civilian defense.

Mr. KILDAY. I personally doubt that they would get any contribution if they spent very much money because personal equipment of the workers is not provided for in this bill, nor would land count as a contribution.

Mr. CANFIELD. I have in mind only that covered by this bill.

Mr. KILDAY. Under this bill they are going to have to contribute to the purchase of organizational equipment locally and I agree with the chairman that that would be a matter for the decision of the Administrator.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Wherein does this language in section 408, pages 42 and 43, limit the expenditures to $3,000,000,000, or any other sum if the Administrator finds that more money is necessary?

Mr. KILDAY. I will have to ask the staff to point that out.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KILDAY. I yield.

Mr. ELSTON. I think that the $3,100,000,000 is only an estimate, and obviously if this legislation should pass, since there is no limitation placed upon it, the Administrator could go before the Committee on Appropriations and ask for additional appropriations.

Mr. KILDAY. That is true, and if a limitation is considered desirable, I have no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The way this language reads now, the Bureau of the Budget can transfer any sum within the purposes of this act, whether it be three billion or three hundred billion dollars. I see no limitation whatsoever.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I think this is important, and I think it is important that we do it now. I agree this is the type of program where hysteria can take control and run hog wild. Places that need this civilian-defense work the least will probably be organized the first, and it will be more difficult to get the really critical areas to go ahead with the program than it will be in the smaller places where the need is not so great. In this legislation we have attempted to put every safeguard around it. I believe the provisions we have of putting the State rather than the local community in contact with the Administrator of Civilian Defense on the State contribution and local contribution and the allocation of funds is going to do a great deal toward preventing the mistakes we made before and putting the available money where it is needed the most within the individual State.

We have attempted to avoid our previous mistakes and I hope we have succeeded.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 17 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ELSTON].

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I voted to report this measure out of committee, although I was opposed to some of the provisions contained in it. It is a matter of great regret that legislation as far-reaching as this had to be so hastily considered. This measure involves not only the possible expenditure of $3,100,000,000, but additional sums if they become necessary. While there are some objections to the pending bill, it is a definite improvement over the measure that was originally submitted to us. The first draft of the bill conferred powers on the Administrator, the like of which have never been conferred on even the President of the United States during wartime. In the very brief time that our subcommittee had an opportunity to consider this legislation I think we corrected many of the objectionable features of the original bill. While the measure as now presented to the House is far from being perfect, and I think it might be improved by amendments offered on the floor or in conference, I believe it is the best that we could obtain in the short time in which we had to consider it.

Let us bear in mind at the outset that this is permanent legislation. I raised the question in committee that there should be some limitation of time, and it occurs to me that there should be a termination date so that Congress later on can reconsider the whole program. We followed this procedure as to rent control and other legislation. In a few years we will be in a position to decide whether or not legislation as far-reaching as this shall be continued. We cannot know what conditions may be like a few years hence. It can do no harm to the program for Congress to reappraise the whole situation in the light of conditions as they may exist after the passage of several years.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. JUDD. Does the gentleman intend to submit an amendment to that effect? I hope he does.

Mr. ELSTON. It is my purpose to do so. I feel there should be some limitation. It would not hamper the efforts of the Administrator and it could not adversely affect the program if the Congress should retain some control other than through appropriations.

Mr. JUDD. Is it not true that the Congress has been ahead of the administration on this matter and that there have been repeated requests here during many months for the administration to act? If there is continued need for the program, the Congress will extend the legislation; and, if not, it ought to expire.

Mr. ELSTON. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman. Before we vote on this bill let us consider some of its principal provisions.

Take the shelter program for example. The greater part of the appropriations that will be made will be for shelters. While the bill provides that the States shall make equal contributions for shelters, I do not believe that any plan has as yet been devised for the erection of shelters in the critical target areas. I cannot tell you today exactly what plan the administration has for the building of these shelters. We all know that if an atomic attack comes, it may come in a matter of minutes. Under the circumstances the most important thing is to educate the people to protect themselves in the shortest period of time available. We would have to build an untold number of shelters in order to protect all the people in a target area. Of necessity there would have to be a sufficient number so as to enable people to reach them in ample time. If the shelters are going to be near the center of the atomic burst, they, of course, would be destroyed along with everything else.

It has been argued, and I think there is some merit to the argument, that you might do more harm than good if they cannot quickly be reached, since an alarm would cause people to leave their homes and expose themselves to the increased danger in the streets. We have not been given a very clear-cut picture as to the kinds of shelters which are to be built. Some cities have come in with plans to build underground garages and parking areas, linking them up with the civil defense, and making the contention that if they are built the civilian population will have an opportunity to use them as shelters. It was conceded by one of the witnesses who appeared before us that that kind of shelter could only protect people in its immediate vicinity. There was no satisfactory explanation as to what would happen if the parking area were filled with automobiles at the time of an attack. It was admitted that a downtown garage would afford no protection to those who live in the suburban areas. The suggestion was made that these people would have to protect themselves by building shelters in their back yards or by strengthening their own homes. It was conceded likewise that the average basement is not safe because the force of the explosion might cause a collapse of the building. So the whole program is not very clear, although it is contemplated that more than $2,000,000,000 will be spent on this phase of the program.

While the States are to contribute for shelters vast power is conferred upon the Administrator in this respect: If the States do not go along with the program of the Administrator, it is entirely within his power to deny funds to the State. The bill provides that the money denied to a State shall be allocated to other States that do comply with the Administrator's orders and plans.

I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN], who interrogated the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] a moment ago, is familiar with what happened in Ohio some years ago when an administrator in Washington was given power to determine what money should be allocated to the States under the Federal security program. The Federal Administrator got into a controversy with the Governor of Ohio and refused to allocate certain funds to the State of Ohio. As a result the State of Ohio has been endeavoring since to recover money lawfully due. The same thing could be true here; if the States do not comply strictly with the regulations of the Administrator, he could reallocate the money to other States. As he determines what are critical areas there could easily be a controversy on this question.

If a State is not satisfied with any decision of the Administrator, there is no appeal. This, I submit, is a matter that should have been given further consideration.

It was my hope that we might report out legislation which would take this whole matter up on a temporary basis, authorizing the appropriation of such funds as were needed for the immediate future and letting the next Congress determine what should be done about the shelter program and other things which could wait.

The original bill provided that the States might enter into compacts with each other, which compacts were subject to approval by the Administrator. The original bill went even further than that. It provided that States might enter into compacts with foreign governments, subject to the approval of the Administrator. Some of us raised the question of the constitutionality of such provisions, and they were deleted from the present bill. This measure, however, still provides that compacts may be entered into between the States.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DURHAM. I think the gentleman will remember that when that point was raised the committee took from the bill the proviso which did give the Administrator the power. It is found in subsection (j) on page 31. We changed the language to read:

(j) Arrange for the sale or disposal of materials and facilities found by the Administrator to be unnecessary or unsuitable for civil defense purposes in the same manner as provided for excess property in the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended.

It would go back to the Treasury, and not to the Administrator for redistribution to the States.

Mr. ELSTON. That is true as to materials sold, but as to the reallocation of funds it says he shall allocate funds to the other States. It does not say anything about the money reverting to the Treasury but merely provides that the Administrator shall allocate the funds to the other States who comply with his directive.

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GROSS. Does this bill permit the building of express highways around cities or around so-called primary target areas? Does it permit the building of express highways around a city?

Mr. ELSTON. I doubt that the bill as now written would permit anything of that kind. I do not believe it would go quite that far.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I have a wire from the mayor of the city of New York in which he asks that we authorize in this bill parking garages on the theory that they are excellent underground shelters and says that the Senate bill permits money to be used for that purpose. Can the gentleman comment on that matter?

Mr. ELSTON. I do not think that is a wise provision. I cannot agree with the language in the bill as reported by the other body. We are concerned with civilian defense. The section to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROWN] referred earlier in this debate was placed in the bill so that it would not be possible for a municipality to build a parking area or garage, use it for income purposes, and tie it in with civilian defense. I do not believe that the present Acting Administrator believes it is a good provision. If we are going to permit in this legislation the building of garages and parking areas, and other self-liquidating projects or income-producing projects, I believe we would be doing it to the detriment of the civilian population.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DURHAM. At the present time these municipalities can go to the RFC and borrow money. There is nothing to prevent that in this bill.

Mr. ELSTON. That is correct.

Mr. DURHAM. We still have that authority. If approved by the State administrator and they serve a useful purpose and can be used, there is nothing to prevent them from being used as a shelter space.

Mr. ELSTON. That is true.

Mr. DURHAM. We have over 16,000 municipalities in this country. You would immediately place the Administrator in the position of having to endorse or not endorse these projects, an almost impossible job. It looks to me like the question is an insurmountable one. It is a matter of whether or not these underground garages would be feasible where you store cars from day to day and you run the people in there by the thousands, nobody to smoke, nobody to throw away a cigarette. You would immediately have all kinds of danger. These various communities should justify their projects on the basis of the worth of them. I have no objection to them being built for this purpose. If they can be built as a bomb shelter and later we would be in position probably to help in making them bombproof we should do so. But to go out and endorse them in blank, which we would have to do, is something I do not think we ought to do.

Mr. ELSTON. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. ELSTON. If the Congress is going to permit projects of this kind to be considered, this could become the greatest boondoggling proposition imaginable. Every city that had a project of this kind would be putting on all kinds of pressure to have their projects approved. That I say would be detrimental to civil defense. As the gentleman from North Carolina pointed out, if a city itself goes to the RFC or some other lending agency and obtains a loan, and builds a garage, the Administrator may find that that garage under certain circumstances would be useful. He may thereafter authorize its improvement if it can be made useful for the protection of the civilian population, and he may authorize the expenditure of money upon that property. I submit that the better way is for the city to go to the RFC and make the application as they would make any other application, then let the Administrator later on determine whether or not the project is useful.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Would not the city, at least, be entitled to have from the Administrator that determination in advance, even if he is not putting up the money to the extent that it will be necessary?

Mr. ELSTON. I have no doubt that they can get his opinion about it, but to tie it in in a civilian defense bill, I submit is wrong. This is not the place for it.

Mr. JAVITS. The gentleman does not feel, however, that it is very important to make this project for civil defense self-liquidating, if possible; that there should be no inhibition in the bill against making it self-liquidating? It seems to me if these projects could be built it would save money.

Mr. ELSTON. This bill does not bar self-liquidation.

Mr. JAVITS. In other words, it does not inhibit it.

Mr. ELSTON. If they could show the RFC that their plan was meritorious and borrowed the money, it may be that the Administrator would later on find that the project can be used, but to tie it in with civilian defense in the first instance would mean that every city that wanted to build a parking lot or a garage would be contacting the Administrator. He definitely is not the one to pass on the merits of a self-liquidating project except as it may be useful for civilian defense. He should not be called upon to pass upon such projects in the first instance.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. As I understand it, though, this simply prohibits the approving of any project which is of such sound value as to reasonably assure retirement or repayment of construction, because they are all within a period of 50 years. We do not talk in this bill about reconstruction loans; we talk about sound value if I can read the English language correctly. How can there be any objection to the Administrator of Civilian Defense spending money, that is, money that we authorize here, for the construction of a garage, we will say? I can understand why you might not want to use it to house people during the war, but the construction of a building or a garage that will do as a shelter during an emergency, and once the emergency is over, can be used by the community as a garage and will have some permanent value afterward. Under this bill he has the power to stop them from using it for any purpose other than defense, if he wishes to.

Mr. ELSTON. There is nothing, I would say to the gentleman, that prevents the Administrator from approving the use of a parking area or a garage. The only purpose of the section to which the gentleman refers is to keep the Administrator from being the one who in the first instance spends the taxpayers' money, to build projects which are income producing or self-liquidating.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I understand the gentleman's position. I think we both have the same thought as to what we want to accomplish, but it seems to me that this language does not accomplish that. It does something else. I am not unmindful of the fact that in London the subways were the greatest bomb shelters that they had. They were already there. And, I presume in case of an attack in New York the subways will be used. If I was in New York and I thought a bomb attack was coming, I would hit one of those subways as fast as I could get there, and so would any other person. Now, the gentleman has in his city, which I am well acquainted with, a rapid-transit system that might possibly be of great value as a bomb shelter. Other cities might desire to spend the money to build a bomb shelter in the form of a subway system, and, once the emergency was over, it could be used for rapid transit. Seemingly this bars them, and I just think this language ought to be looked over so that after the emergency is over it could be used for some good purpose. I am not unmindful of the fact that during the other war we had a civil-defense program, and we had these dancing courses in it, and everybody saving us from harm; and after the war we even took the tin hats and sold them and made flower pots out of them.

Mr. ELSTON. I see the gentleman's position. Of course there would be projects that would be perfectly sound, but as a matter of policy the Administrator of Civil Defense is not the one to pass on those projects in the first instance. The project in Cincinnati to which the gentleman refers has been completed, and there would not be anything in this bill that could prevent the Administrator from spending funds to strengthen it or otherwise making it useful for the protection of the civilian population.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Suppose you wanted to extend that system?

Mr. ELSTON. If they wanted to extend the system, then the city should finance it as they financed it originally, provided the city was making the extension for income. If the extension was proposed solely for civilian defense the Administrator could authorize it. The section in question only prohibits the Administrator from authorizing self-liquidating projects in the first instance. If the law is otherwise, the door would be opened for all sorts of boondoggling projects.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. I understand the word "boondoggling." I know what boondoggling is. I think this provides for boondoggling. Boondoggling takes its name from the fact that you have done something that has no lasting value. That is what it was back in the New Deal days.

Mr. ELSTON. I usually agree with my colleague from Ohio, but on this I think I must disagree with him. It does not do anything of the sort. This provision is put in here to prevent that, and to require the Administrator to devote his energies and his efforts to the protection of the civilian population—not to pass upon projects where civil defense is only incidental.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. If the Administrator of Civil Defense would find that by the construction of 2 miles more of that rapid-transit system in the gentleman's city he could furnish protection for the citizens in that area just as well as he could by something that would have no value after the war was over, would he not be barred from building that because it would have use later on?

Mr. ELSTON. He would not be barred if the extension is for civil defense. He would be barred if the extension were for revenue purposes and civil defense is only incidental.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman from Ohio now speaking is absolutely correct, because to follow the other course would tax the people in my congressional district to build improvements in cities X, Y, and Z. If they want to do that, let them borrow the money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or private industry or private individuals and build their self-liquidating proposition and pay for it and take care of the situation themselves.

Mr. ELSTON. I want to thank the gentleman from Michigan for his views. If we do not have this provision in this act many cities will begin to devise plans and bring them to the Administrator. Some of them have plans that have been turned down by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Now they are seeking to tie them in with civil defense.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. I was present at the hearings on this bill, although they were not as long as I would wish them to be. We should recognize the fact that the cities themselves should contribute some of their ingenuity and money to help protect themselves. That is why I agree with the gentleman's argument. May I say for the RECORD at some of the best features of the bill we have before us are due to the suggestions of the gentleman from Ohio, who now has the floor.

Unfortunately, before this bill was set down on the calendar I had made arrangements for a conference on the housing bill, in which I am vitally interested, for the armed services. I may not be here when the roll is called, if there is a roll call, so I want to announce now that I am heartily in favor of the bill and if I am here will vote for it. If I am absent, it will be because I realize that my vote is not needed to pass the bill.

Mr. ELSTON. I appreciate the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEATING. In my city they are now constructing what is called a veterans' war memorial which contains a large auditorium. Under the auditorium is a ramp where, it is said, 10,000 people could be housed. I presume under the construction as laid out this would not serve as a proper shelter in case of any attack; or would it be appropriate and within the provisions of this bill for the municipality to come to the Administrator here with a request for aid simply to the extent that it might be necessary to bolster up that building or make it stronger for the purpose of serving for this function.

Mr. ELSTON. I have no doubt but what conferences could be had with the Administrator, and I think the Administrator would be justified in advising whoever has charge of the project as to the feasibility of strengthening the building so that it might be used for civilian protection. The only purpose of the section we are debating is to prevent going to the Administrator in the first instance with the entire project and tying in civilian defense with self-liquidating projects.

Mr. KEATING. In this case all of the funds have been raised and no Federal funds are involved at all at present. But the cost is something like $4,000,000. It might be that for $5,000,000 they could make it suitable for a bomb shelter. Then, as to the additional million, it would be appropriate for them to make this application?

Mr. ELSTON. Yes; and the Administrator, I think, would have authority to grant it.

Mr. Chairman, there are many other features of the bill which I had hoped to discuss, such as the seizure provisions; the provisions with respect to the transfer of appropriations, and the like. We have taken every precaution we can to prevent the Administrator from seizing property which is not needed. We have placed a provision in the bill, for example, that as to any project involving more than $500,000 he must come to the Congress and submit his plans. The bill does not have the approval of Congress, but he has to come to us before he approves of any project involving over half a million dollars. Moreover, the Administrator has to report to the Congress every 3 months in order that Congress may keep in touch with the activities of his agency. I repeat that this measure is not perfect, but I believe it is the best we can hope for under existing conditions. Our committee has eliminated many of the objectionable features of the original bill, and I shall support it.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE].

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, the Congress now has before it an assignment of historic importance—acting upon legislation that will set up a permanent Federal Civil Defense Administration and establish a national civil defense program for the United States. Since the beginning of this month the Armed Services Committees of both Houses, working in close collaboration with the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy, have been drafting legislation designed to achieve these ends. Bills incorporating the considered views of these committees are now being submitted to the full Congress for scrutiny and approval.

It is a sobering, but necessary, thing that your elected Representatives should now find themselves concerned with legislation of this sort—legislation which has no parallel in our history. We Americans are by tradition and instinct a people of peace; we do not take joyously to forging the instruments of our common defense. But, as aggressors have always learned in the past, albeit at the price of American dead, we are also a people who can look hard facts in the face, and derive the necessary moral therefrom.

It takes no unique insight, nor any secret information concerning Soviet intentions or capabilities, to tell us why we need as soon as possible a sound and effective civil defense program. The necessity for such a program derives from a single unescapable fact that is known to us all—we live in a world which contains the aggressive Soviet dictatorship armed with weapons of mass destruction.

Like my colleague from Texas [Mr. KILDAY], I am very much disturbed when I hear anyone, any citizen, doubt the fact that the Russians have the atomic bomb. They not only have the atomic bomb, but the men in the Kremlin are stockpiling atomic bombs, and they are expanding their air force, which already includes long-range bombers. They have the atomic bomb; they are stockpiling it, and they have deliverability.

Mr. JONAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question? I do not want to interrupt the gentleman's thought.

Mr. PRICE. Yes; I am glad to yield to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. JONAS. The gentleman's statement is what I have been waiting for. It seems to me that we would make a much more appealing approach to the passage of this legislation, in the minds of the people, if someone in authority or someone who should have the facts was prepared to get up and state that Russia has the bomb, that we know it definitely, and know it is a matter of certainty, and that this legislation is being urged and accelerated because of the lurking dangers in the fact that Russia has the atomic bomb. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE] is the first one that I have heard in connection with this legislation, or any other legislation of a similar character, to definitely and positively state that Russia has the atomic bomb and is able to exploit it to the extent that it is comparatively as dangerous as ours. Is that information based on hearsay, or is it based on fact?

Mr. PRICE. I will say with all the emphasis and positiveness that I have that there should be no doubt left in the mind of any single American that the Russians have the atomic bomb, that they have an atomic-energy program, that they are stockpiling atomic bombs, and that they have long-range bombers. It is time for us to stop living in a fool's paradise. I want the House not only to know that, but if there is anyone in any corner of America who has any doubt in his mind about it, it is time that we in the Congress removed that doubt. I can definitely assure the American people that Russia is developing her atomic strength.

Mr. JONAS. Does the gentleman say as a matter of certainty and positiveness that he has evidence—tangible, physical evidence—that will establish beyond a reasonable doubt that Russia has an active and live and dangerous bomb, comparable to the one that we have?

Mr. PRICE. Absolutely and positively.

Mr. JONAS. Very well. I am satisfied.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRICE. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. I would like also to inform the gentleman that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRICE] is a member of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy.

Mr. JONAS. I was glad to get that information. At least someone has gone on record that that is a fact and we can say to our constituents that it is a fact.

Mr. PRICE. It is absolutely a fact, and it is a dangerous thing for us not to recognize that fact. There is no question about it.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRICE. I yield.

Mr. CANFIELD. Is it not true also that the Soviet Union has real, hard, concrete plans for the civilian defense of their cities and towns?

Mr. PRICE. Yes.

Mr. CANFIELD. And today thousands and thousands of Russians are being trained in the very art in which we are so remiss.

Mr. PRICE. Yes, I think the gentleman is absolutely right. It is time for us to do something for our own protection. It is time for us to get this program into action to meet the demands of local communities and States in this country. It is time for Congress to act; we should act now. We may have some misgivings on the great power that is given to the Administrator, but we should waive those aside to meet this very vital need.

The men in the Kremlin are stockpiling atomic bombs; they know, these men who seek dominion of all the globe, that the industrial might and prowess of American cities and workers stands between them and world conquest. We must, therefore, assume that our cities and civilian populations may rank high on the Kremlin list of priority targets.

And I want to say in this respect that when any group of planes sets out on a bombing mission some of them are going to get through, no matter what the defense against them is or how great. All records of air attack show that a number of them get through. We are not an impregnable Nation. If an air attack is brought against any target in this country some plane or some group of planes is going to get through. There is no question about that either.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRICE. I yield.

Mr. DURHAM. I think the committee should remember the fact that in World War II only 16 percent of our bombers were shot down at the worst—in World War II in a very small area. The other 84 percent always got through.

Mr. PRICE. Yes: the gentleman is absolutely correct. I want to go a little further than that. Sixteen percent represents the greatest number ever shot down in a particular attack. The average number of planes stopped in air attacks was only 8 percent. Conceding that we were able to shoot down or stop 30 percent in an enemy air attack, and that may be doing almost the impossible, it means 70 percent would get through. These are some of the things that Americans should know and should be thinking about and doing something about. We should be thinking about it right now when we are considering this legislation.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRICE. I yield.

Mr. SHORT. We all know that to wipe out Detroit would be as severe a loss as the loss of any battle that could be imagined between contending armies.

Mr. PRICE. Certainly.

The oceans no longer grant our homeland general exemption from the ravages of war. We find ourselves, in truth, facing a situation resembling the days of the Indian wars—when our civilians and soldiers were exposed to equal dangers.

Should our towns and cities be attacked, a civil-defense program instantly ready to minimize casualties and restore facilities vital to the prosecution of the war may mean the difference between victory and defeat. It is estimated that first-rate civil-defense measures and 12 minutes' advance warning of an atomic attack might reduce casualties by as much as 50 percent.

Mr. SHORT. Yet some people would do nothing but wait until our cities are wiped out and our civilians killed before they would take any action.

Mr. PRICE. They want to wait until it is too late.

The wartime experience of England bears this out. Except for the heroism and skill of her civil-defense workers, England might well have been brought to her knees by the Nazi onslaught from the air.

But civil defense is more than war insurance; it is peace insurance as well. If an enemy knows that we are ready and able to meet an attack on our cities, he will think twice before attempting to launch a perfidious knock-out blow in the hope that it will paralyze our people and industries beyond rehabilitation. So civil defense not only greatly increases our chances for victory if war does come; it lessens the likelihood of war as well.

I want to emphasize that the urgent necessity for this program is merely underscored by the tragic happenings in Korea. The fundamental reason for these measures stems from the fact that with each passing week and month, the Soviets stockpile more materials that can be turned into weapons of mass destruction. No possible momentary easing of Red pressure will change this fact, nor reduce the necessity for civil defense. On the contrary, such a program as this will be needed until such time as, under United Nations auspices, the weapons of war are themselves subjected to international regulation.

Long before Red aggression had fully revealed its ugly form in Korea, it seemed clear to me that a soundly considered civil-defense program was an indispensable part of our agenda for national survival. Last winter, I and my colleagues of the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy held hearings to survey the state of our civil-defense preparations. We found that much constructive planning was under way, but we impressed upon the executive branch of the Government our deep conviction that we must move forward in this crucial era with all possible speed.

The legislation now before the Congress represents the culmination of many months of hard work. It embodies two principles that have been basic in all our thinking on civil defense: first, that civil defense is a job for civilians; second, that a proper civil-defense program will demand the teamwork of all levels and branches of our Government.

Our military leaders have informed the Congress that this is a job for civilians. In time of war, our armed forces will have their hands full in discharging their proper responsibility—taking the war to the enemy's soil. The legislation reflects this conviction.

The legislation also provides for the intimate teamwork that will be necessary if our program is to succeed.

It is in our cities that bombs may fall. The measure before the Congress, therefore, properly leaves our local communities vested with primary responsibility for civil defense.

But our States will also have a vital role to play—in coordinating the activities of their municipalities, in acting as the channel of communication between Washington and our cities, in mobilizing State-wide resources to meet an attack, in arranging with neighboring States for mutual assistance if the resources of one State prove inadequate. I regard this matter of interstate assistance, parenthetically, as of the highest importance, and because of this conviction some weeks ago I called upon all communities in the St. Louis metropolitan area, in Missouri and Illinois, to coordinate their civil-defense effort in one master plan. I am glad this legislation before us today carries provisions for interstate compacts.

Yet part of the civil-defense job must be given to the Federal Government. The legislation recognizes this. The Civil Defense Administration provided for in the bill would have such responsibilities as these—preparing national plans and programs, reviewing and coordinating the civil-defense activities of the various departments and agencies of the Federal Government, making provision for the dissemination of air-raid warnings, sponsoring and farming out research programs that will enable us better to treat the effects of attacks, training civil-defense officials and instructors from our States and local communities, conducting an information program that will give our people authoritative advice on how to prepare for an attack and what to do if one comes, encouraging the States to negotiate interstate civil-defense compacts, making financial contributions to augment the civil-defense expenditures of our States and local communities—such activities, under this legislation, will fall within the province of the Federal civil-defense agency.

A few words on the financing of this program may give you some indication of the problem's magnitude. The program envisaged by the Civil Defense Administration over the next 3-year period would cost $3,100,000,000—of this sum, the Federal Government's share would be somewhat more than a billion and one-half dollars, or 54 percent.

It is no exaggeration to call this civil-defense legislation a revolutionary departure in our jurisprudence. We are entering upon waters still in good part uncharted; we cannot be sure that the measure now before the Congress is the final answer to our problem—the field is too new for final answers. But I am confident that this legislation gets us off to a good start, and I know that the Congress will keep our civil-defense preparations under constant review.

Sound legislation is vital to the success of this undertaking. Far more vital still is the manner in which everyday Americans will give of their time and skill to our civil-defense program. There can be no let-George-do-it attitude on the part of any person in this country. If we are to succeed we must act as a united people in meeting this common danger.

Prompt enactment of this measure is necessary to permit the Federal Government to provide the leadership State and municipal governments have been demanding for months. It is our responsibility here today to create the machinery which will meet these demands.

I hope the House will give unanimous support to this very important legislation.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 2 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, there has been some question raised here as to whether or not Russia has atomic weapons. I would like the Committee to be assured of the fact that those weapons do exist today; also this bill covers a little more than atomic weapons. It covers bacteriological warfare, it covers conventional bombing and gas warfare, and all of those things which have not been mentioned that I feel should be called to the attention of the Committee.

Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have permission to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLEMENTE. Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for this legislation because I believe that it is vitally important to the defense and preparedness of this country, but I do so feeling that much more might have been placed in this bill for the assistance of highly populated municipalities, now commonly referred to as the natural target cities. In a congested area like New York City, the cost of the site alone will be between 25 percent and 50 percent of the total cost of the project. This automatically reduces the Federal participation far below 50 percent of the actual cost. I doubt very much whether some States may find it possible to provide adequate shelters under these conditions. I strongly urge, as did the Honorable Vincent R. Impellitteri, mayor of the city of New York, that shelter funds be used to pay part of the cost of permanent projects that will be useful for defense as well as peacetime purposes.

The actual construction of bomb shelters as such is of great need during time of attack, but what becomes of the bomb shelters in peacetime? All I am attempting to do here is help establish a permanent civilian program that will afford the communities having bomb shelters the opportunity of utilizing these shelters for some other constructive purpose in time of peace.

We in New York City realize that our city is probably on the list of prime targets, and we are determined to be prepared when the attack comes. But whenever anything is planned the future is involved. Therefore, I believe some consideration should be given to these congested areas.

I am trying to speak for all cities, but I shall speak in particular of my own city.

New York City is the greatest city in the world. It is the crossroads of the world commerce. The great part played by New York City in World War II is known to all, and it will be ready again—more so than before. It is the nerve center of industry and the financial center of the world, and the Nation's most important gateway. New York City is one of the most vital life lines for the defense of the United States.

I honestly believe that some changes in the bill should be made in order that due consideration might be given large cities such as New York.

MILITARY AND ECONOMIC IMPORTANCE OF NEW YORK CITY TO THE DEFENSE OF THE NATION

First. Defense production in New York City: New York City has proved its ability to function as a great center of war production.

The value of war contracts awarded to firms in New York City from early July to early December 1950 amounted to 14.7 percent of the total for the United States during that period.

During World War II, New York City made a great contribution to the Nation's war production effort. Through June 1945, war supply contracts amounting to $9,438,667,000 were awarded to manufacturers in the metropolitan area, consisting of the five counties of the city of New York and Nassau, Suffolk, Westchester, and Rockland Counties. Altogether the New York metropolitan area accounted for approximately 5 percent of the Nation's total war production output. As of 1942, approximately 550 plants in New York City were engaged in war production work.

Second. New York City as a center of military transportation and supply: During World War II, the port of New York was the Nation's most important base for the overseas transportation of military personnel and supplies. More than 50 percent of all shipping backing up our war effort passed through the port of New York. It became the busiest harbor in the world and there was such a tremendous expansion of its activities that in 1944 the port handled 10 times its peacetime volume of traffic.

Overseas movements of troops from the New York area, along with shipments of vast quantities of supplies, were handled by the huge New York port of embarkation located on the water front at First Avenue and Fifty-eighth Street in Brooklyn. Between Pearl Harbor and December 31, 1946, 3,489,427 troops with equipment embarked from this great military transportation facility. During the same period, 3,145,364 troops and other passengers returned through this port of embarkation. And, in addition, 76,596,716 tons of supplies were shipped through the port and its outports, such as the one at Albany, N. Y. When in full operation during World War II, the New York port of embarkation was equipped to handle 100,000 troops per day and move supplies that would fill freight cars extending from New York City to North Carolina.

Third. New York City as a defense base and center of military operations: In and near New York City there is concentrated a vast network of military headquarters and Armed Forces installations, agencies, and facilities.

(a) Army: The First Army Headquarters, with jurisdiction over the States of New York, New Jersey, Delaware, and all of the New England States, is located on Governor's Island. The forts situated within the city include Fort Jay on Governor's Island, Fort Hamilton in Brooklyn, Fort Tilden on the Rockaway Peninsula, Fort Totten in Bayside, Queens, and Fort Wadsworth on Staten Island. The city is dotted with a myriad of offices, installations, and facilities necessary for the administration of Army activities and the conduct of Army operations.

(b) Navy and Marine Corps: New York City is the headquarters of the eastern sea frontier.

The Brooklyn Navy Yard ranks with the largest naval shipyards of this country. During World War II it was one of our most important centers for the construction of fighting ships. In 1943, at the peak of its activities, it employed almost 70,000 men and women.

At the Brooklyn Naval Base and at other facilities in the port of New York, ships of our Navy are constantly being repaired, serviced, and supplied.

The Bayonne Navy Base at Bayonne, N. J., in the New York harbor, is an important facility for drydocking, supplying, and berthing ships of the Navy.

A naval air base is maintained at Floyd Bennett Field in Brooklyn. Numerous naval and Marine Corps agencies and installations essential to the operations of these branches of the armed forces are located in various parts of the city.

(c) Air Force: The headquarters of the United States Air Force Continental Command are at Mitchel Field, Long Island, a short distance from New York City's Eastern boundary. A number of Air Force agencies and facilities are located within the city.

Fourth. New York City as a center of population: According to the 1950 Federal Census, New York City has a population of 7,841,023, or more than 5 percent of the entire population of the United States. The city's millions live in an area of 320 square miles traversed by about 5,700 miles of streets and served by more than 1,400 miles of subway, bus, and trolley lines. These lines carry 9,936,000 passengers daily.

In the New York metropolitan census district, consisting of New York City, Nassau, Suffolk, Westchester, and Rockland Counties in New York State, and Bergen, Essex, Hudson, Middlesex, Morris, Passaic, and Somerset Counties in New Jersey, a population of 12,838,143 is concentrated. This is about 8.5 percent of all our people.

Moreover, almost a quarter of the Nation lives within 250 miles of New York City.

Every business day about 650,000 commuters come into New York City. It is estimated that on a typical business day, about 3,765,000 people enter the portion of the island of Manhattan south of Sixty-first Street, an area of only nine square miles.

The metropolitan area and surrounding districts are closely linked with New York City by economic ties and other bonds of interdependence. A major disaster in New York City would cause swift and serious repercussions in suburban and neighboring localities.

It is self-evident that from the standpoint of population alone, New York City is the most inviting atomic target in the Western Hemisphere.

Fifth. New York City as the industrial, commercial, and financial leader of the Nation:

(a) Industrial and business activity generally: Over 243,000 business and manufacturing firms are established in New York City. They give employment to almost 3,000,000 people and their annual payrolls total well over $9,000,000,000.

Nearly one-half of the largest corporations in the United States make their headquarters in New York City, as well as hundreds of others with Nation-wide activities.

(b) Manufacturing: Although people are not accustomed to thinking of New York City as a great industrial center, it has been the leading manufacturing city of the country since 1824. The industrial supremacy of New York City is reflected in the 1947 census of manufactures of the Federal Census Bureau, which shows that the New York metropolitan area—the New York metropolitan census district described above—was far ahead of the other metropolitan areas of the country as a manufacturing community.

Here is an excerpt from the 1947 census of manufactures showing the relative industrial standing of the New York metropolitan area and 10 of the other leading metropolitan areas of the Nation:

Census of manufactures: 1947—Vol. I, U. S. Department of Commerce, Bureau of Census

[Excerpt from table 4—standard metropolitan areas]

Standard metropolitan areas:	Value added by manufacture [1]
New York, northeastern New Jersey	$9,322,683,000
Chicago	5,529,062,000
Detroit	2,910,650,000
Philadelphia	2,803,106,000
Los Angeles	2,052,671,000
Pittsburgh	1,707,918,000
Cleveland	1,546,157,000
Boston	1,391,157,000
St. Louis	1,296,471,000
San Francisco-Oakland	1,049,490,000
Buffalo	1,023,231,000

[1] Value of products less cost of materials, supplies, fuel, electricity, and contract work.

In 1939, New York City accounted for more than a quarter of the total industrial production of the 14 largest cities in the United States. In the same year, the value of its manufactures was 7.2 percent of the value of all manufactured goods produced by the entire Nation.

There are presently over 41,000 manufacturing firms in New York City. In 1947 they produced over $12,000,000,000 worth of goods.

(c) Wholesale and retail trade: New York City is the leading wholesale market of the Nation. Its wholesale sales exceed $20,000,000,000 a year. Available figures show that in 1939, the city's wholesale sales amounted to about one-fourth of the total for the country.

New York City is the greatest retail market in the Nation, with more than 115,000 retail sales outlets. In 1948 the city's retail sales amounted to almost $8,000,000,000. As of 1939, retail sales in the city were 7.6 percent of the country's total.

(d) Finance and banking: New York City is the financial capital of North America.

During 1949, the banks of New York City cleared checks amounting to almost $359,000,000,000, or almost half the total cleared in the United States. Here is a table showing bank clearings during 1949 in the 14 cities of the Nation with the highest bank clearings. This table demonstrates that bank clearings in New York City in 1949 were nearly eight times as great as those of the city with the next largest figure.

1949 bank clearings

(From Commercial and Financial Chronicle, Monday, Jan. 16, 1950, pp. 40–41)

New York City	$358, 842, 127, 086
Philadelphia	45, 243, 000, 000
Cleveland	15, 177, 252, 645
Pittsburgh	14, 754, 868, 469
Baltimore	10, 796, 546, 527
Atlanta	11, 603, 100, 000
Detroit	19, 485, 020, 385
Chicago	35, 806, 922, 419
St. Louis	13, 605, 415, 859
Minneapolis	12, 696, 801, 286
Kansas City	15, 147, 198, 256
Dallas	12, 259, 102, 374
Galveston	10, 488, 302, 223
San Francisco	19, 512, 663, 849
Grand total (183 cities)	756, 212, 778, 557
Outside New York City	397, 370, 651, 471

As of June 30, 1947, bank deposits in New York City totaled about $27,500,000,000. In January 1946, 23.7 percent of the bank deposits of the entire country were in New York City banks.

A recent release of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System reveals that the banks of New York City which are members of the Federal Reserve System have total assets which are more than three times as great as those of the member banks of the city next in order of rank with respect to value of member bank assets. Here is an excerpt from this release:

Assets and liabilities of all banks in the United States, Oct. 25, 1950

[Partly estimated—in millions of dollars]

Total assets, all banks	183, 580
Total assets, all commercial banks	161, 290
Total assets, all Federal Reserve System member banks [1]	137, 363
Total assets, New York City banks, members of Federal Reserve System	26,829
Total assets, Chicago banks, members of Federal Reserve System [1]	7, 216

[1] Does not include most savings banks and some other banks.

Approximately 75 percent of the foreign trade of the United States is financed by the banks of New York City.

New York City is considered the Nation's chief life insurance center. As of 1942, 300 companies, with assets of over $37,500,000,000, had their headquarters in this city.

In 1945 the activity on the New York Stock Exchange included more than 65 percent of all shares of stock sold in the country and more than 90 percent of the face value of bonds sold.

There are six commodity exchanges in New York City. The New York Cotton Exchange is the world's chief futures market for American cotton. The New York Produce Exchange is the principal cash market for wheat in North America, and is also a large cash market for corn, oats, other grains, and flour. The Commodity Exchange, Inc., is a market for rubber, raw silk, hides, copper, lead, zinc, and tin. The New York Coffee and Sugar Exchange is the largest of the world's exchanges for both coffee and raw sugar futures. The New York Cocoa Exchange is the only organized cocoa market in the United States. Trading in butter, eggs, and potatoes is carried on at the New York Mercantile Exchange.

(e) Food: New York City is a key center for the distribution of food. Approximately 10 percent of all food consumed in the United States is handled at the Port of New York. In the metropolitan area, taking in a population of approximately 13,000,000, about 60,000,000 pounds of food are consumed daily, or almost 11,000,000 tons per year.

(f) Real estate: There are 838,025 parcels of taxable real estate in New York City, having an aggregate assessed value of $18,396,138,375.

(g) Public utilities: The tremendous needs of New York City for electricity, gas, and steam are met by the greatest system of public utility plants in the country. To meet the city's growing demands, the public utility supplying electricity to its inhabitants increased its capacity from 2,329,000 kilowatts in 1942 to 2,842,000 at present. The utilities supplying gas increased their total capacity from 393,500,000 cubic feet per day in 1942 to 651,000,000 today. The utility furnishing steam to many of the city's huge buildings enlarged its capacity from 8,036,000 pounds per hour in 1942 to 10,041,000 at present. There are more than 3,000,000 telephones in the city.

Sixth. New York City as a transportation center:

(a) The port of New York is the Nation's greatest seaport. The port of New York is the leading seaport of the United States and the Western Hemisphere. It includes the harbor facilities of New York City and contiguous waters of New Jersey, and extends over a total shoreline of 771 miles.

Ships entering the port are served by a total of 2,000 piers, wharves, and quays. According to the latest prewar figures, more than $900,000,000 are invested in terminals, warehouses, and equipment for handling commerce in the port.

In 1949 more than 25,000,000 long tons of cargo, having a total value of more than $6,000,000,000, were moved in foreign trade through the port of New York. This was about 50 percent of the value of the entire foreign trade of the United States for that year.

The total water-borne commerce of the port in 1949, including foreign, coastwise, intercoastal and internal movements, amounted to about 115,000,000 long tons.

About one-third of all general cargo—as distinguished from tanker cargoes and certain bulk shipments—shipped in the foreign trade of the United States is moved through the port of New York.

The port of New York also leads in the coastal trade. In 1949 there were approximately 10,000 movements of deep-sea vessels in and out of the port, which is served by more than 100 steamship lines.

Most of the waterborne passenger traffic to Europe and almost 60 percent of the South American traffic are handled in the port of New York. More than 750,000 overseas passengers were carried to and from the port in 1949.

The largest group of customs brokers and shipping agents in the country is concentrated in New York City.

(b) Railroads: The city of New York is one of the leading railroad terminals of the country. The port area is served by 12 railroads. In 1949 these railroads moved 77,100,000 tons of freight into, from, or through the port of New York. Ten major railroad lines carry approximately 190,000,000 passengers, exclusive of commuters, in and out of New York City annually.

(c) Trucking: New York City is one of the great trucking terminals of the country. As is shown by exhibit K hereto attached, it is estimated that approximately 14,512,000 tons of freight were moved by tractor-trailer trucks into or through the city during 1948. This does not include the large volume of freight handled by trucks other than tractor-trailers, nor does it reflect shipments originating in New York City.

(d) Airports: New York City is the greatest commercial air traffic center in the world. LaGuardia Airport, the busiest in the world in scheduled flights, is principally devoted to handling domestic traffic, while New York International Airport, the largest and most modern in the world, is predominantly an overseas air terminal. During the first 11 months of 1950 a total of 3,566,000 scheduled airline passengers used these airports. Of these, 474,000 were overseas passengers.

New York City is presently served by 24 scheduled air carriers. Twenty-five percent of all domestic scheduled airline passengers land or take off at the airports serving the New York City area.

(e) Highways, bridges, and tunnels: The New York metropolitan area is knit together by a vast system of highways, bridges, and tunnels which are of vital importance to the flow of traffic through the metropolitan area and neighboring regions. Among the better known of these facilities are the George Washington, Manhattan, Brooklyn, Triborough, Williamsburg, Queensboro, and Bronx-Whitestone Bridges, the Holland, Lincoln, Queens-Midtown and Brooklyn-Battery Tunnels, the West Side Express Highway, the Henry Hudson Parkway, and the Circumferential Parkway.

The CHAIRMAN. All time having expired, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee substitute be considered as read, and printed in the RECORD at this point, and open to amendments at any point thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The committee substitute follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950."

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. It is the policy and intent of Congress to provide a plan of civil defense for the protection of life and property in the United States from an enemy attack. It is further declared to be the policy and intent of Congress that this responsibility for civil defense shall be shared by the Federal Government and the several States. The Federal Government, to the maximum extent possible, shall provide necessary coordination and guidance; shall be responsible for the operations of the Federal Civil Defense Administration as set forth in this act; and shall provide necessary assistance as hereinafter authorized.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. As used in this act—

(a) The term "attack" means any attack or series of attacks by an enemy of the United States causing, or which may cause, substantial damage or injury to civilian property or persons in the United States in any manner by sabotage or by the use of bombs, shellfire, or atomic, radiological, chemical, bacteriological, or biological means or other weapons or processes;

(b) The term "civil defense" means all those activities and measures which are designed or undertaken either: (1) to minimize the effects which might otherwise be caused by, (2) to deal with the immediate emergency conditions created by, or (3) to make emergency repairs or otherwise effect emergency restoration of vital utilities and facilities destroyed or damaged by enemy attack within the United States and affecting the civilian population. The principal activities and measures in civil defense are: (1) preattack preparation, including, but not limited to, organization, establishment of operational plans and supporting agreements, recruitment, training, research, procurement, stockpiling, construction, provision of warning systems, shelters, shelter areas, control centers, and when appropriate accomplishment of nonmilitary evacuation; (2) attack provisions and arrangements, including, but not limited to, enforcement by established authorities of prescribed passive defense regulations required by military or civil authorities, evacuation to shelter areas, traffic and panic control, control and use of lighting and communications; and (3) immediate postattack measures, including, but not limited to, firefighting, rescue, emergency medical, health and sanitation, monitoring for specific hazards of special weapons, unexploded bomb reconnaissance, essential debris clearance, emergency welfare measures, emergency and immediately essential repair of damaged vital facilities;

(c) The term "organizational equipment" means equipment determined by the Administrator to be necessary to a civil defense organization as distinguished from personal equipment;

(d) The word "materials" shall include raw materials, supplies, medicines, equipment, component parts and technical information and processes necessary for civil defense;

(e) The word "facilities," except as otherwise provided in this act, shall include buildings, shelters, utilities, and land;

(f) The term "States" shall include the several States, the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the possessions of the United States; and

(g) The term "neighboring countries" shall include Canada and Mexico.

TITLE I—ORGANIZATION

FEDERAL CIVIL DEFENSE ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 101. (a) There is hereby established in the executive branch of the Government a Federal Civil Defense Administration (hereinafter referred to as the "Administration") at the head of which shall be a Federal Civil Defense Administrator appointed from civilian life by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Federal Civil Defense Administrator (hereinafter referred to as the "Administrator") shall receive compensation at the rate of $17,500 per year.

(b) There shall be in the Administration a Deputy Administrator who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive compensation at the rate of $16,000 per year. The Deputy Administrator shall perform such functions as the Administrator shall prescribe and shall act for, and exercise the powers and perform the duties of, the Administrator during his absence or disability.

(c) The Administrator shall perform his functions subject to the direction and control of the President.

TITLE II—POWERS AND DUTIES

DETAILED FUNCTIONS OF ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 201. The Administrator is authorized, in order to carry out the above-mentioned purposes, to—

(a) prepare national plans and programs for the civil defense of the United States, making such use of plants and programs previously initiated by the National Security Resources Board as is feasible; sponsor and direct such plans and programs; and request such reports on State plans and operations for civil defense as may be necessary to keep the President, the Congress and the several States advised of the status of civil defense in the United States;

(b) review the civil defense activities of the several departments and agencies of the Federal Government and coordinate them with each other and with the civil defense activities of the States and, through the Department of State, with neighboring countries;

(c) make appropriate provision for necessary civil defense communications and for dissemination of warnings of enemy attacks to the civilian population;

(d) study and develop civil defense measures designed to afford adequate protection of life and property, including, but not limited to, research and studies as to the best methods of treating the effects of attacks; developing shelter designs and materials for protective covering or construction; and developing equipment or facilities and effecting the standardization thereof to meet civil defense requirements;

(e) conduct or arrange, by contract or otherwise, for training programs for the instruction of civil defense officials and other persons in the organization, operation, and techniques of civil defense; conduct or operate schools or classes, including the furnishing of subsistence and quarters for trainees and instructors subject to reimbursement on terms prescribed by the Administrator; and provide instructors and training aids as deemed necessary: Provided, That not more than one national civil defense college and three civil defense technical training schools shall be established under the authority of this subsection: Provided further, That no land shall be acquired and no buildings shall be constructed pursuant to this subsection;

(f) publicly disseminate appropriate civil defense information by all appropriate means;

(g) assist and encourage the States to negotiate and enter into interstate civil defense compacts (consent to which is hereby given by the Congress); review the terms and conditions of such proposed compacts in order to assist to the extent feasible in obtaining uniformity therein and consistency with the national civil defense plans and programs; assist and coordinate the activities thereunder; aid and assist in encouraging reciprocal civil defense legislation by the States which will permit the furnishing of mutual aid for civil defense purposes in the event of an attack which cannot be adequately met or controlled by a State or political subdivision thereof threatened with or undergoing attack;

(h) procure, construct, lease, transport, store, maintain, renovate or distribute materials and facilities for civil defense, with the right to take immediate possession thereof: Provided, That facilities acquired by purchase, donation, or other means of transfer may be occupied, used, and improved for the purposes of this act, prior to the approval of title by the Attorney General as required by section 355 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (40 U. S. C. 255): Provided further, That the Administrator shall report not less often than quarterly to the Congress all property acquisitions made pursuant to this subsection: And provided further, That before entering into any transaction pursuant to this subsection in an amount or value of $500,000 or more, the Administrator shall report thereon in full detail to the Congress.

(i) make financial contributions, on the basis of programs or projects approved by the Administrator, to the States for civil defense purposes, including, but not limited to, the procurement, construction, leasing, or renovating of materials and facilities. Such contributions shall be made on such terms or conditions as the Administrator shall prescribe, including, but not limited to, the method of purchase, the quantity, quality, or specifications of the materials or facilities, and such other factors or care or treatment to assure the uniformity, availability, and good condition of such materials or facilities: Provided, That, except as otherwise provided in section 303 (d) of this act, no contributions shall be made for State or local personnel and administrative expenses, or for items of personal equipment for State or local workers, or for the procurement of land: Provided further, That the amounts authorized to be contributed by the Administrator to each State for organizational equipment shall be equally matched by such State: Provided further, That financial contributions to the States for shelters and other protective facilities shall be determined by taking the amount of funds appropriated or available to the Administrator for such facilities in each fiscal year and apportioning same among the States in the ratio which the urban population of the critical target areas (as determined by the Administrator) in each State, at the time of the determination, bears to the total urban population of the critical target areas of all of the States: Provided further, That the amounts authorized to be contributed by the Administrator to each State for such shelters and protective facilities shall be equally matched by such State and, if not matched within a reasonable time, the Administrator may reallocate same to other States on the formula outlined above: Provided further, That the value of any land contributed by any State or political subdivision thereof shall be excluded from the computation of the State share: Provided further, That the amounts paid to any State under this subsection shall be expended solely in carrying out the purposes set forth herein, and in accordance with State civil defense programs or projects approved by the Administrator. Whenever the Administrator, after reasonable notice and opportunity for hearing the State, finds that there is a failure to expend funds in accordance with the terms and conditions governing the Federal contribution for such approved programs or projects, the Administrator shall notify such State that further payments will not be made to the State from appropriations under this act or from funds otherwise available for the purposes of this act (or in his discretion from appropriations under this act for any approved program or project with respect to which there is such failure to comply) until he is satisfied that there will no longer be any such failure. Until he is so satisfied, the Administrator shall either withhold the payment of any financial contributions to such State, or limit payments to the program or project with respect to which there is substantial compliance with the terms and conditions governing the Federal contribution for such program or project: Provided further, That the Administrator shall not approve any project which is of such sound value as reasonably to assure the retirement or repayment of the construction costs thereof within a period of not more than 50 years: And provided further, That the Administrator shall report not less often than quarterly to the Congress all contributions made pursuant to this subsection.

(j) arrange for the sale or disposal of materials and facilities found by the Administrator to be unnecessary or unsuitable for civil defense purposes in the same manner as provided for excess property in the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended.

RELATION OF DEFENSE PRODUCTION ACT OF 1950 TO CIVIL DEFENSE

SEC. 202. The terms "national defense" or "defense" as used in title II of the Defense Production Act of 1950 shall be construed to include "civil defense" as defined in this act.

MUTUAL AID PACTS BETWEEN SEVERAL STATES AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES

SEC. 203. The Administrator shall give all practicable assistance to States in arranging, through the Department of State, mutual civil defense aid between the States and neighboring countries.

IDENTITY INSIGNIA

SEC. 204. The Administrator may prescribe insignia, arm bands, and other distinctive articles (including designs previously covered under Letters Patent which were assigned to the United States and held by the Office of Civilian Defense created by Executive Order No. 8757 issued May 20, 1941), which may be manufactured for or possessed or worn by persons engaged in civil defense activities pursuant to rules and regulations for the manufacture, possession, or wearing thereof established by the administrator. The manufacture, possession, or wearing of any such insignia, arm band, or other distinctive article otherwise than in accordance with such rules and regulations shall be unlawful and shall subject such person to a fine of not more than $1,000 or imprisonment of not more than 1 year, or both.

TITLE III—EMERGENCY AUTHORITY

NATIONAL EMERGENCY FOR CIVIL DEFENSE PURPOSES

SEC. 301. In the event of an enemy attack or in anticipation of imminent enemy attack, the President may proclaim a national emergency for civil defense purposes. Such emergency shall continue until terminated by the Presidential proclamation or by concurrent resolution of Congress.

UTILIZATION OF FEDERAL DEPARTMENTS AND AGENCIES

SEC. 302. During the period of such emergency, under such terms and conditions as to donation, compensation, or return as may be prescribed, and solely for civil defense purposes, the President may direct any Federal department or agency to provide, and such departments and agencies are hereby authorized to provide—

(a) their personnel, materials, and facilities to the Administrator for the aid of the States;

(b) emergency shelter by construction or otherwise; and

(c) on public or private lands, protective and other work essential for the preservation of life and property, for clearing debris and wreckage, and for making emergency repairs to, and temporary replacement of, communications, hospitals, utilities, transportation facilities, or public facilities of States or their political subdivisions damaged or destroyed by attack.

EMERGENCY POWERS

SEC. 303. During the period of such emergency, the Administrator is authorized to—

(a) exercise the authority contained in section 201 (h) without regard to the limitation of any existing law including the provisions of the act of June 30, 1932, as amended (40 U. S. C. 278a), and section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (41 U. S. C. 5), and section 3734 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (40 U. S. C. 259 and 267), and the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended;

(b) sell, lease, lend, transfer, or deliver materials or perform services for civil defense purposes on such terms and conditions as the Administrator shall prescribe and without regard to the limitations of existing law;

(c) coordinate and direct, for civil defense purposes, the relief activities of the various departments and agencies of the United States as provided in section 302 hereof;

(d) reimburse any State for the compensation paid to and the transportation, subsistence, and maintenance expenses of any State employees or employees of political subdivisions of any State while engaged in rendering civil defense aid outside the State and to pay fair and reasonable compensation for the materials of the State government or any political subdivision utilized or consumed outside of the State, including any transportation costs, in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Administrator. As used in this subsection, the term "employees" shall include full- or part-time paid, volunteer, auxiliary, and civil-defense workers subject to the order or control of a State government or any political subdivision thereof, and such employees shall not be deemed by reason of such reimbursement to be employees or appointees of the United States;

(e) provide financial assistance for the temporary relief or aid of any civilian injured or in want as the result of any attack; and

(f) employ temporarily additional personnel without regard to the civil-service laws and to incur obligations on behalf of the United States for civil defense purposes as authorized in this act.

During the period of any such emergency, the Administrator shall transmit quarterly to the Congress a detailed report concerning all action taken pursuant to this section.

IMMUNITY FROM SUIT

SEC. 304. (a) During the period of such emergency, neither the Federal Government nor, except in cases of willful misconduct, gross negligence, or bad faith, any officer or employee thereof while complying with or attempting to comply with any provision of this act or of any rule, regulation, or order issued pursuant to this act shall be liable to any person, whether or not such person is engaged in civil defense, for death, injury, or property damage resulting therefrom. Nothing contained in this section shall affect the right of any person to receive any benefit or compensation to which he might otherwise be entitled under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act, as amended (5 U. S. C. 751), or any other act of Congress providing for any pension or retirement.

(b) The death or disability of any employee of the Federal Government incident to his performance of civil-defense duties pursuant to this act shall, for the purposes of any law providing benefits for the death or disability of Federal employees, be deemed to constitute death or disability incurred by him in the course of an incident to his principal Federal employment.

WAIVER OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE ACT

SEC. 305. During the period of such emergency, the functions and duties exercised under this act shall be excluded from the operation of the Administrative Procedure Act (60 Stat. 237), except as to the requirements of section 3 thereof.

TITLE IV—GENERAL PROVISIONS

ADMINISTRATIVE AUTHORITY

SEC. 401. For the purpose of carrying out his powers and duties under this act, the Administrator is authorized to—

(a) employ civilian personnel for duty in the United States, including the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, subject to the civil-service laws, and to fix the compensation of such personnel in accordance with the Classification Act of 1949, as amended; and subject to the standards and procedures of that act, to place not more than 22 positions in grades 16, 17, and 18 of the General Schedule established by that act, and any such positions shall be additional to the number authorized by section 505 of that act; and, notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, except those imposing restrictions upon dual compensation, employ, in a civilian capacity, with the approval of the President, not to exceed 25 retired personnel of the armed services on a full- or part-time basis without loss or reduction of or prejudice to their retired status;

(b) appoint such advisory committees and employ such part-time advisory personnel (including not to exceed 25 subjects of the United Kingdom and the Dominion of Canada) as are deemed necessary in carrying out the provisions of this act. Persons holding other offices or positions under the United States for which they receive compensation, while serving as members of such committees, shall receive no additional compensation for such service. Other members of such committees and other part-time advisory personnel so employed may serve without compensation or may receive compensation at a rate not to exceed $50 for each day of service, as determined by the Administrator;

(c) utilize the services of Federal agencies and, with the consent of any State or local government, accept and utilize the services of State and local civil agencies; establish and utilize such regional and other offices as may be necessary; utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services by individuals or organizations as may from time to time be needed; and authorize the States to establish and organize such individuals and organizations into units to be known collectively as the United States Civil Defense Corps: Provided, That the members of such corps shall not be deemed by reason of such membership to be appointees or employees of the United States;

(d) notwithstanding any other provisions of law, accept gifts of supplies, equipment, and facilities; and utilize or distribute same for civil defense purposes in accordance with the provisions of this act;

(e) reimburse any Federal agency for any of its expenditures or for compensation of its personnel and utilization or consumption of its materials and facilities under this act to the extent funds are available;

(f) purchase such printing, binding, and blankbook work from public, commercial, or private printing establishments or binderies as he may deem necessary upon orders placed by the Public Printer or upon waivers issued in accordance with section 12 of the Printing Act approved January 12, 1895, as amended; and

(g) prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper to carry out any of the provisions of this act, and, without being relieved of his responsibility therefor, perform any of the powers and duties vested in him through or with the aid of such officials of the Administration as he may designate.

EXEMPTION FROM CERTAIN PROHIBITIONS

SEC. 402. The authority granted in subsection 401 (b) shall be exercised in accordance with regulations of the President, who may also provide by regulation for the exemption of persons employed or whose services are utilized under the authority of said subsection from the operation of sections 281, 283, 284, 434, and 1914 of title 18 of the United States Code and section 190 of the Revised Statutes (5 U. S. C. 99).

SECURITY REGULATIONS

SEC. 403. (a) The Administrator shall establish such security requirements and safeguards, including restrictions with respect to access to information and property, as he deems necessary. No employee of the Administration shall be permitted to have access to information or property with respect to which access restrictions have been established under this subsection until it shall have been determined that no information is contained in the files of the Federal Bureau of Investigation or any other investigative agency of the Government indicating that such employee is of questionable loyalty or reliability for security purposes, or, if any such information is so disclosed, until the Federal Bureau of Investigation shall have conducted a full field investigation concerning such person and a report thereon shall have been evaluated by the Administrator. No such employee shall occupy any position determined by the Administrator to be of critical importance from the standpoint of national security until a full field investigation concerning such employee shall have been conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a report thereon shall have been evaluated by the Administrator.

(b) Each Federal employee of the Administration, except the subjects of the United Kingdom and the Dominion of Canada specified in section 401 (b) of this act, shall execute the loyalty oath or appointment affidavits prescribed by the Civil Service Commission. Each person other than a Federal employee who is appointed to serve in a State or local organization for civil defense shall before entering upon his duties, take an oath in writing before a person authorized to administer oaths, which oath shall be substantially as follows:

"I, ————, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties upon which I am about to enter.

"And I do further swear (or affirm) that I do not advocate, nor am I a member or an affiliate of any organization, group, or combination of persons that advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence; and that during such time as I am a member of the (name of civil defense organization), I will not advocate nor become a member or an affiliate of any organization, group, or combination of persons that advocates the overthrow of the Government of the United States by force or violence."

Any person who shall be found guilty of having falsely taken such oath shall be punished as provided in Eighteenth United States Code, section 1621.

TRANSFERS TO ADMINISTRATION

SEC. 404. The functions, property, and personnel of the Federal Civil Defense Administration established by Executive Order No. 10186, issued December 1, 1950, are hereby transferred to the Administration established by this act.

UTILIZATION OF EXISTING FACILITIES

SEC. 405. In performing his duties, the Administrator shall (1) cooperate with the various departments and agencies of the Government; (2) utilize to the maximum extent the existing facilities and resources of the Federal Government, and, with their consent, the existing facilities and resources of the States and local political subdivisions thereof and other organizations and agencies; and (3) refrain from engaging in any form of activity which would duplicate or parallel activity of any other Federal department or agency unless, with written approval of the President, the Administrator shall determine that such duplication is necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act.

ANNUAL REPORT TO CONGRESS

SEC. 406. The Administrator shall annually submit a written report to the President and the Congress covering expenditures, contributions, work, and accomplishments of the Administration, pursuant to this act, accompanied by such recommendations as he shall deem appropriate.

APPLICABILITY OF ACT

SEC. 407. The provisions of this act shall be applicable to the United States, its Territories, possessions, and the District of Columbia, and their political subdivisions.

APPROPRIATIONS AND TRANSFERS OF FUNDS

SEC. 408. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act. Funds made available for the purposes of this act may be allocated or transferred for any of the purposes of this act, with the approval of the Bureau of the Budget, to any agency or Government corporation designated to assist in carrying out this act: Provided, That each such allocation or transfer shall be reported in full detail to the Congress within 30 days after such allocation or transfer.

ATOMIC ENERGY ACT OF 1946

SEC. 409. Nothing in this act shall be construed to amend or modify the provisions of the Atomic Energy Act of 1946, as amended.

FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

SEC. 410. Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize investigations of espionage, sabotage, or subversive acts by any persons other than personnel of the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 411. If any provision of this act or the application of such provision to any person or circumstances shall be held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provisions to persons or circumstances other than those as to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

Amendment offered by Mr. JAVITS: Page 30, line 19, after the colon, strike out all of line 19 down to and including line 23.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of my amendment has been developed in the course of general debate. It goes directly to the idea that the Administrator shall, rather than shall not, participate with municipalities, in projects which are important to civilian defense and, at the same time, may be self-liquidating. The provision which I seek to strike out prohibits that and does really something that is very anomalous in a Congress that is trying to make its money go the longest way it possibly can. It says that if a project can liquidate itself under 50 years, then no money is to be put up by the Administrator to help with the project. It seems to me that we would expect that the thing would go just the other way. If a project was useful and important and could be liquidated within a reasonable period of time so that you could put a bond issue on it, we certainly would want the Administrator to make it possible that that should be done, and in that way save money. In addition to that, many cities will want to build projects under this bill for civilian defense, and at the same time find it only possible to build those projects through a bond issue, because they would be otherwise useful. The reason is that most cities are carrying heavy indebtedness now; they have little money for civilian defense purposes unless they get it through bond issues, which generally are not permitted unless the project is of a self-liquidating character. Many cities are deeply interested in the building of underground parking garages for example. They would serve very importantly in the whole civil defense program while at the same time relieving traffic congestion also vital to internal security.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Mrs. BOLTON of Ohio. If those underground places are used for garages and when the garages are not empty, what happens to them?

Mr. JAVITS. Obviously the Administrator is not going to devote money to that purpose unless he is satisfied that the conditions are such as to serve civilian defense purposes. I am sure that in imminence of attack, they will not be used except for civilian defense. The technical evidence on the subject is certainly complete on the use of such facilities for civilian defense.

That brings me to the main point of this argument, or the argument which will be made against this amendment, because it was made in general debate, and that is that it will burden the Administrator with a lot of applications for projects which may involve improvements to cities, and so on and that, it is said, is not the intention of the bill. I assume the Administrator is not going to be soft-headed about this proposition, and he is not going to be weak about distributing this money for projects which are not full value for civilian defense purposes. I think we must act on the fact that the Administrator will have that much sense to see through programs which are not for civilian defense and to see that projects he helps are primarily for civilian defense.

In the other body this very bill encourages exactly such projects of participation by municipalities and does not directly discourage them as this bill proposes to do.

This civil defense effort is extremely important. The people of the country have been waiting for it. Certainly the people of the big cities have been waiting for it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. KENNEDY] and I demanded action on civilian defense and a national civilian defense establishment of the President months and months and months ago. I am delighted that this bill is here, but I do not think we should be shortsighted about the fact that we want to make it attractive for municipalities to join with the Administrator in civil defense projects by making it possible for them to establish projects essential to civil defense which are at the same time self-liquidating.

I think that perhaps unwittingly the House will be doing a disservice to New York, Detroit, Chicago, Pittsburgh, San Francisco, Los Angeles—and every other big city in the country—which will participate in this program by leaving this proviso in instead of leaving it out.

I hope very much the Committee of the Whole will see the justice of this position as it was clearly seen over in the other body and will strike out this prohibition which, I think, will result in making civilian defense work less productive than it could be.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know that there is much that I can add to what was said at the time I was discussing this bill in general debate. I do, however, want to say that if we want to turn the Civil Defense Administrator into a WPA official, then the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York should be adopted. If, on the other hand, we want to allow the Administrator to deal in purely civil defense matters, this amendment should be rejected.

I am sure we can readily appreciate exactly what is going to happen if the Administrator has the power and the authority to pass on projects which are to be self-liquidating or income-producing. In the first place, he would be flooded with applications to approve all types of projects. His time is needed for matters that deal solely with civil defense.

As I stated before, there is nothing to prevent the Administrator from considering any kind of project provided the project is already in existence. He could consider an underground garage or a parking area or any other kind of building, provided it was already constructed or plans had been made to construct it and it had been financed. That is exactly what he expects to do. He expects to consider all types of buildings and determine which ones might be useful for civil defense. But he should not be charged with the responsibility of having to pass on these projects in the first instance. We should not by this bill pave the way for the Administrator to have to consider projects wherein civil defense is only incidental. If such projects have merit, the cities concerned can go to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or to other lending agencies and get the money.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. I am right, therefore, in pinpointing the whole discussion on the question of the burden on the Administrator. Just as an administrative question, there is no substantive reason why this should not be done; is not that true? It is just a question as to whether we in the Committee of the Whole think we want the Administrator to do that job or whether we do not. There is no substantive reason against it.

Mr. ELSTON. There is more to it than that, because I hope Congress will appropriate only what is absolutely necessary for civil defense.

If we are going to have to deal with projects that are costly, like underground parking areas and the like, we may find there will be all kinds of pressure put on the Administrator to approve them. Before we know it we will be spending far more money than is contemplated. In the first place, the general idea of using parking areas and garages and the like for civilian defense is not good. It has not been explained what would occur if there was a bombing raid while a garage was filled with automobiles.

In the first place, garages in themselves are hazardous because of the presence of gasoline. As evidence of this most garages have signs warning against smoking. So far those are the types of self-liquidating projects that have been urged. The mayor of the city of Boston, for example, testified before our committee and indicated they were considering a large underground parking project. There was testimony before our committee to the effect that some of the projects of that type had been disapproved by the RFC and they had not been able to obtain money. It was obvious to me, and I think to some of the other members of the committee, that they are now trying to tie such projects into civilian defense. I suggest the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York should be voted down.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be an idea in Washington that we can solve practically every question by writing a bit of legislation and appropriating a few million or billion dollars. That is a sort of overall remedy. I do not believe in being frightened into that method.

This bill in the declaration of policy declares:

> It is the purpose and intent of the Congress to provide a plan for civil defense for the protection of life and property in the United States from enemy attack.

Then down, beginning at line 15, it defines what the authors of the bill mean by an enemy attack. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS] and his remarks in support of that amendment may or may not disclose some of the moving forces back of this bill. We had some legislation like this one time, and if memory serves correctly, there were a lot of selfish, greedy people who used that legislation for the advancement of their own interests.

Here we go again. Admittedly New York has a terrific problem of transportation. Now, under the guise of civilian defense is the rest of the country to furnish money to solve that problem? Build garages in New York—which is what the gentleman proposes?

That is what the gentleman's argument amounts to. Every other city in the country will have the same argument. If this was a bill to protect, for example, the blast furnaces in the district of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], or if it was something like that, I could see the reason for it because we must have blast furnaces. We must have production facilities. If it was a bill to protect other war-production industries I could see the reason for it, go along with it. But here it is, a bill to protect the civilian population who cannot be in any danger unless there is an attack upon this country. I think folks will admit that there is a limit somewhere to our ability to furnish dollars or to produce. Personally, I do not worry overmuch any longer about threatened national bankruptcy. In my comparatively short life I have been bankrupt, busted, if you want to call it that, several times. I have lived through one or two depressions with the people of my community. It never hurt me any. All I had to do was to get along with a little less, work a little harder, and while I did not like it at the time, ultimately I think the result was good for me. I think perhaps the same thing is true of the Nation. Perhaps through a depression is the only way our people will learn.

Everyone will admit that there is a limit to the number of men, young men, the best of the young men, that we can induct into the armed services. Already we are being told that we will have to get out of Asia because there are too many people over there who do not agree with us and who are making their disagreement unpleasantly known to us. In the end we will get out of Asia proper. Why not do it now? If our protection calls for aid to the Chinese who are fighting communism, let us aid them, but not with American men. If we can serve our interest by aid to Japan, let us give it. I think it was this morning I read in the press a somewhat similar statement by someone in authority, who I assume had knowledge, as to Europe. That is to say that it was a little bit beyond our power to hold Europe and send an army of foot soldiers to conquer Russia. Are we not overtaxing our resources, our manpower, when we attempt to put 200,000 men in Europe as is now proposed? And later perhaps a million or two million more? Is it not apparent that in the end, sometime, somewhere along the line we will find it necesary, if we intend to preserve our own national existence and protect the security of the Republic, to forget sending Americans across the seas to fight, exhaust themselves and die everywhere al lover the world? Is it any more than common sense to realize that great as we are there is a limit to our resources, our manpower? Is it not time for us to get out of Asia, out of Europe, spend our dollars, our efforts, in support of those who are doing the fighting rather than, as this bill proposes, for made work—for your and my protection, for the protection of those who are in no immediate danger?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAVITS].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ELSTON: On page 43 after line 23 insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 412. After June 30, 1954, or after the date of the passage of a concurrent resolution by the Congress, which declares that the powers conferred on the Administrator under the provisions of this act are no longer necessary for the accomplishment of the purposes of this act, whichever shall first occur, none of the functions authorized under such provisions may be exercised."

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Chairman, the language of this amendment simply indicates that it is the intention of Congress that this legislation shall not be considered to be permanent. We are conferring vast powers upon the Administrator. Many of the delegations of power are necessary. At least we cannot take a chance on not delegating them at this time. In my opinion, we are delegating more power than is necessary. Therefore if we give the Administrator an opportunity to carry into effect the far-reaching provisions of this act, it seems to me that Congress should, within a reasonable time, go over the whole program and review it. We hope this is only temporary legislation and that the present emergency will soon be over. If it does not end, Congress should later consider a continuance of the law in the light of conditions existing at that time.

If this amendment is adopted the act will terminate on June 30, 1954, which is the end of a fiscal year, or upon the passage of a concurrent resolution by the Congress which declares that the powers conferred on the Administrator under the provisions of the act are no longer necessary. It may be that Congress will determine before June 30, 1954, that this act should be terminated, but if Congress does not do it by concurrent resolution, then when June 30, 1954, comes around, the law ceases to function.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELSTON. I yield.

Mr. JUDD. I want to compliment the gentleman for offering this amendment. If adopted, it will permit Members to vote for the bill with greater assurance that its powers will not be abused. Such extraordinary powers are granted in this bill that it is all the more important that Congress have a check upon them. If the Administrator and his officials know that at a given period they have got to come back here for extension of their powers in case that should be necessary, it is bound to be a stimulus to the best kind of administration. If the program is well handled, it will be continued if necessary; if not, we ought to have a chance to look it over, modify it, or end it.

Mr. ELSTON. Yes. I want to thank the gentleman from Minnesota for his contribution. We have put similar amendments in other legislation. I believe we have a similar provision in the ECA bill. In a law as far reaching as ECA and as important as this legislation is to the Nation there should be congressional review.

Congress has been criticized for delegating too much power to agencies of Government. We are now delegating vast power because of a great emergency. Since the emergency may change, a review of the law is essential. This amendment simply permits that review before June 30, 1954, but allows the act to be terminated on that date if there is no further reason for it.

I hope the committee will adopt the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL: Page 43, after line 23 add a new section as follows:

"SEC. 412. There is hereby created a volunteer army composed of persons on the home front who are neither in the draft nor are members of any enlisted unit of the Armed Forces, but who possess firearms and have knowledge of their use.

"(a) The function of this volunteer army shall be to help guard the home front against surprise attack or in case of invasion.

"(b) Primary weapons to be used by such volunteer army shall be firearms already in the possession of its members, for which duly authorized permits have been issued.

"(c) Ammunition for such firearms shall be available to members of said auxiliary force by the Secretary of Defense, and supplied through regular present business channels.

"(d) Setting up of local units throughout the Nation shall be in the hands of hunting and sportsmen's organizations and of other outdoor groups, coordinated and assisted by officers on detail from the United States Army.

"(e) Such groups shall be trained solely for local defense and shall be conducted on a voluntary basis."

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman reserve his point of order?

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina reserves a point of order against the amendment.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL] is recognized.

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. Mr. Chairman, there are hundreds of hunting and sportsmen's organizations in this country; there are about 40 such in the congressional district which I represent. These organizations are composed of the most patriotic and loyal American citizens. Their members range through all age groups; they are hunters, good shots, and they are expert in the use of firearms.

My contention is that a volunteer group of this kind, legalized as they are throughout the length and breadth of America, would compose a vigilant group which in the case of attack would be an auxiliary force to any home defense or home guard or State militia that we might have. Of course, there would be many members of these organizations drafted into the Regular Armed Forces and others would serve in various contingent groups; however, there are those others who would not be affected in these hunters' organizations. They could organize locally in such a way that they would compose a definite and powerful defense arm on behalf of the American public.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Does the gentleman provide any compensation for these people who would be taken in under his amendment?

Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL. I assure the gentleman this does not cost the Government a penny, because these men, all patriotic citizens beyond draft age, good shots, good hunters, good sportsmen, would immediately spring to the defense of their country in case of attack. They could be organized and coordinated into units by these sportsmen's organizations. They would not expect or require compensation.

I offer this amendment at the suggestion of certain groups of hunters and at the request of sportsmen in my district who have urged me to place this before the House. I am sorry that a point of order has been made against the amendment and I hope the Chair will rule against it, because I believe my amendment is germane. It would certainly add a great deal to what has already been proposed here today.

These hunters and sportsmen's organizations in my district will contribute no end to the home defense of America. I believe these people can be utilized. They can be organized and themselves carry the ball to a great extent in the defense of our homes, our schools, our churches, and our land in case of this attack which everybody says is possible.

Mr. Chairman, I submit the amendment to the committee. I trust these organizations will be utilized by the Civilian Defense authorities because they are in a position, due to their knowledge of firearms, due to their knowledge of the local terrain, the lay of the land, the geography of the section in which they live, to form a vigilante group which would be of invaluable assistance in the defense of our country. Many other Members have these organizations in their respective districts. Due to to the good hunting and the excellent outdoor facilities that exist in my district, I have a number of these sportsmen's organizations. I believe that we are overlooking one of the greatest sources of national defense in the event—God forbid—the enemy should overrun this beloved land of ours. These men, great patriots all, would be in position to spring to the defense of the country immediately and in a very effective manner. I submit that we would be shirking our duty, we would be neglectful of our responsibility, if we did not enlist and recruit the abilities and the proclivities of these organizations immediately and encompass them into this great defense program involving our civilian front.

Mr. Chairman, many of their members have urged me for several months to present this amendment.

Through it I propose to give hunters and sportsmen a considerable share of responsibility for home-front defense. I am sure they want such responsibility, because to a man they are patriotic and especially fitted for this job.

These hunters' clubs are composed of men through all ages. A large number are beyond draft age and would not necessarily be in other categories of the military.

These men are all expert with rifles and other firearms. They are well acquainted with the terrain and the countryside adjacent to their homes.

In case of attack, such hunters would immediately become the vigilantes of each community. They would meet quickly, organize and deploy to points of trouble within a given radius of their homes.

With their ability to shoot, and to move through woods, hills, and rough country with alacrity, they would present a veritable hornet's nest to an oncoming foe.

Their familiarity with the neighborhood in which they reside would make them as effective in the path of the enemy as any guerrilla fighters. They would harass the invader with deadly accuracy.

These hunters' clubs need little organizing, because they are already set up, composed of men banded together in a common devotion, love of the outdoors. They require only a coordinating hand which could be supplied by the proper authorities.

Such groups are ready and willing to contribute their hunting skill to the common defense. I am positive that to a man, their membership will respond.

As I have said, my amendment does not contemplate any cost in the work of organizing, but it does provide for the supplying of these hunters with ammunition through ordinary business channels in case of invasion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina desire to be heard further in support of his point of order?

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure that the Committee realizes the far-reaching effect of this amendment. In my opinion it would cause a state of confusion and I ask that the Committee vote down the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN ARTHUR HALL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JUDD: Page 40, line 2, and on page 40, line 7, after the word "evaluated", insert the words "in writing."

Mr. JUDD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment will do, I think, what we talked about during general debate to reduce the chance for unsuitable persons to get into the civil defense set-up. It seeks to avoid the sort of situation which has arisen a good many times heretofore in which individuals were hired or retained by agencies in spite of derogatory information submitted to the agencies by the FBI after full field investigation of the employees. Apparently the heads of the agencies felt that there were other considerations which justified them in overriding the findings of the FBI.

I grant that there may be situations where that is justifiable, but I think we ought to fix in the record the responsibility on someone so that if later it develops that damage has been done to our country through appointment or employment of such individuals, those who are responsible for such appointment or employment will be known. We have had instances where individuals about whom the FBI submitted extensive derogatory information were still kept in employment, or were hired for jobs, and then when attempts were made to find out who was responsible, we could not find out. This amendment would merely require that after a full field investigation was conducted and the report was submitted to the Administrator by the FBI, he would have to evaluate that report in writing if he were to hire an individual, notwithstanding derogatory information. In a program as vital as this which reaches into every aspect of our nation's life and gives the agency access to critical information about our war plants and our home defenses, we ought to be doubly careful to make sure that there is nobody in the agency about whose loyalty to the United States any possible question can be raised. It gives protection to the country and also to the Administrator. Since, under the law, he can hire a person only if he is willing to take in writing the responsibility for disregarding any unfavorable information which the FBI develops, he can use the law to resist any pressures on him. If there is no derogatory information, no question is raised. If there is, then the man who hires him notwithstanding ought to be willing to be responsible on the record.

I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JUDD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, well, Christmas is here, but I am afraid Santa Claus will have to forego his usual trips to this great country. He has been so busy giving away presents in foreign countries that he cannot be expected to give us the attention he usually does. Besides this inattention on the part of Santa Claus, which is not his fault but the fault of Congress, many homes have vacant chairs at the holiday dinner table. There will be more sorrow among the people than they have ever experienced before.

This country is in a more perilous position as to its future than at any time in our history. The free nations of the world are up against Communist enemies numbering 1,500,000,000 people who are on the march against our theory of capitalist governments. If we should fail in our attempt to protect this democracy, then the noblest plan of government will be defeated and what we have enjoyed so long—freedom of speech, of the press, of religion, and individual expression—will be denied us. We cannot permit this to happen, and we shall have to give all we have to avert this danger. "Business as usual" will have to wait, and "Business for national defense" will have to take its place. Many things we want and are used to we cannot have, but in this contest we cannot think of ourselves. We cannot mourn over the things we cannot have. We will all have to contribute to the fullest extent we can and place our offering on the altar of freedom. This is no time to think of profits and the increase of wealth. We have a new job, and that is to defend what we already have. Without this defense, we shall have nothing left to defend. More than the property side of this question is a far greater issue, and that is the fate of our free institutions.

We are right back where we were when Patrick Henry said, "Give me liberty or give me death."

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that some of us, at least, are a little naive in our approach to this problem today, and there are certain facts which stare us in the face. One is that the Soviet Union has the atomic bomb. Another fact is the admission of our military leadership that an aggressor nation with an atomic bomb can undoubtedly get through to bomb our cities and towns. There is also another fact adduced in a recent report of the Joint Congressional Committee on Atomic Energy that the Soviet Union, realistically appraising dangers, is feverishly bolstering its civil defenses while we here in the United States of America mark time.

While some of the Members of the House may be running away from this problem today, I am not. It is not because I live in a prime target area. I have seen bombings in this world. I was in London for 3½ weeks in June and July 1944 during the robot bomb attack, and saw those infernal Hitler machines coming in from the Pas de Calais area of the Continent every 5 minutes day and night, literally destroying the capital city of the United Kingdom. I saw how the people of the British Empire reacted in civil defense, because they knew how.

Here today our citizens do not even have a primer, they do not even know the ABC's of civil defense here in our capital city.

Fifteen weeks after Hiroshima and Nagasaki I saw those cities in Japan, and I observed the destructive force of this terrible atom bomb, something they did not have in World War II.

In the New York Times of today appears an editorial on the lag in civil defense in New York City, and I want to quote a few paragraphs from that editorial:

It is a shock to hear that the people of New York City are laggard and remiss in volunteering to protect their own lives and property in the event of a wartime disaster. It is also a shock to learn thae the city's Director of Civil Defense, Arthur W. Wallander, must publicly deplore the apathy of New Yorkers in this respect. And it is a shock to find that less than 10 percent of the personnel needed in civil-defense work in this city have volunteered.

The reason for it, we suspect, is not that our citizens are lazy, callous, or cynical. As Mr. Wallander puts it, it is because "people lack interest and awareness of the possible dangers ahead." The obvious remedy, then, is to point out the dangers as being quite possible and very real and to dramatize and drive home the great need of civil defense, something that has not been done effectively thus far. Above all, New Yorkers must be made to realize that they cannot adopt a let-George-do-it attitude. For it is very evident from Mr. Wallander's report that George is depending on the rest of us, and if and when the blow falls all of us will be very badly off indeed if we do not get busy now.

I know that in the States and in the cities called critical target areas governors and mayors are awaiting the cue from Washington. They want national leadership shown here today in this very bill before us. I am certain that after the passage of this bill they will indicate their readiness to "get on the ball," so to speak, and do a real job. Let us not hem and haw and continue to mark time in this dangerous hour.

We are told in the Washington papers of this very day that the Soviet Embassy here in our Nation's Capital is facing the facts of life. We are told that they are buying new fire hose, and there is also a report that they are digging in.

Members of Congress, who live elsewhere, may have their doubts. I wonder how many have done what I have. I have talked with nearly all of our House employees, those who live here throughout the year, bringing up their children in the Nation's Capital. They are deeply concerned and they stand for this legislation with a remarkable degree of unanimity. Let us proceed to tell our people here and elsewhere we are now moving to do all we can for home defense. It will be reassuring to them and to their brave boys on our fighting fronts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. ROONEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9798) to authorize a Federal civil-defense program, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question is ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DURHAM. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 247, nays 1, not voting 181, as follows:

EXTENDING PROVISIONS OF FIRST WAR POWERS ACT

Mr. SMITH of Virginia, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 887, Rept. No. 3229), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9932) to amend and extend certain provisions of the First War Powers Act, 1941. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and rankink minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. McSWEENEY, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following privileged resolution (H. Res. 888, Rept. No. 3230), which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 3945) to amend sections 3052 and 3107 of title 18, United States Code, relating to the powers of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9893) to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9893, with Mr. GORE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the agreement, general debate will be equally divided. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KILDAY] is recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] for 30 minutes.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill, H. R. 9893, is an authorization bill in the total amount of $1,650,000,000 for military public works projects. On last Friday, December 15, the House passed the second supplemental appropriation bill, which included $1,430,000,000 to finance these projects. In other words, we have already appropriated the major portion of the funds here being authorized.

This is, of course, an unusual proceeding. It is one that was dictated by the necessities of the situation. It was done after conference between the chairman of the Committee on Armed Services and members of the Committee on Appropriations. In normal times, as in the last public-works bill we had, the bill itself sets out item by item in great detail the projects that are authorized in the bill. That is not possible nor feasible at this time because of several considerations, one being the fluid nature of the program at the present time as compared to the long-range program that was contemplated in previous public-works bills. In addition, much of the information as to these installations is classified, many of these items being classified as secret, so that it has not been possible for us to set out in the bill nor in the report exactly what these projects are. However, the committee has in executive session gone over each and every project contemplated by each of the three services. Of course, that information is on hand with the committee. The full Committee on Armed Services considered the bill rather than a subcommittee, and analyzed each one of these projects within the limited time that was available to us. That information, as I say, is on hand with the committee and with the members of the committee. We will be very glad to discuss various items of the bill with those who are interested, understanding, of course, that we are under classification secret as to many of these items.

Title I of the bill authorizes $291,000,000 for general categories of construction within continental United States, $91,000,000 for similar construction overseas, and $7,500,000 for the special-weapons project, making a total of $390,896,900 for Army construction. You have already appropriated $319,750,000, approximately 80 percent of the total, to support this authorization.

This points up the necessity for the authorization bill, notwithstanding the unusual proceedings we have had in adopting the appropriation prior to the authorization. The appropriation did not cover all the funds that will be necessary for the projects contained in that bill, and authorization is necessary for the balance. As we go on, you will see that there were some limitations and the addition of small projects and the elimination of others.

Title II authorizes $327,000,000 for various types of construction within continental United States, and $54,000,000 for construction outside the continental United States, making a total authorization of $381,655,310 for Navy construction. You have already appropriated $303,378,000, approximately 80 percent of the total, to support this authorization.

Title III of the bill authorizes $451,467,000 for construction in continental United States, $367,150,000 for construction outside continental United States, and $66,987,000 for the aircraft control and warning system, both within and without the United States, making a total authorization of $885,604,000 for Air Force construction. You have already appropriated $807,000,000, approximately 90 percent of the total, to finance these projects.

The total authorization of the Army, Navy, Air Force, and Marine Corps is $1,658,156,210. You have already appropriated $1,430,128,000 to finance that authorization.

In order that we may survive as a nation, we have committed ourselves to a greatly expanded military establishment. All of us know that it is going to cost stupendous sums of money to carry out this program In order for the Army to meet its increased responsibility, it is necessary to build or rehabilitate barracks, water mains, and various types of utilities, storage and warehouse facilities, gunnery ranges, station hospitals, roads, parking areas, communications facilities, guided-missile facilities, and numerous other installations. The Army is expanding some existing camps to capacity and is reactivating others which have been in a standy-by basis. Maximum utilization is being made of those World War II facilities which remain available. Wherever it is feasible the Army is exercising its rights under recapture clauses to recover property which has previously been disposed of.

The Navy is being greatly expanded, and I think it should be recognized that when we bring carriers and other types of ships out of mothballs, we must expand existing shore facilities and activate other shore facilities which are required in the training and supply of the increased fleet. The Navy has a dual problem. It must maintain a shore establishment, which is similar in some respects to that of the Army, and it must also maintain aviation facilities ashore to support carriers, antisubmarine warfare, and numerous other naval aviation requirements. Therefore, in addition to conducting an expansion similar to that of the Army, the Navy must expand its air-support facilities. Again, maximum utilization is being made of active shore establishments and those which can be reactivated.

It is accurate to state that the base facilities of the Air Force are more inadequate than those of either the Army or the Navy. This fact is evidenced in the bill which provides more than twice as much authorization for the Air Force than it does for either of the other two services. We must recognize that during World War II the great majority of our air bases were built to accommodate nothing larger than the B–17. We must also recognize the fact that those air bases will not accommodate our present planes of much greater weight, nor do most of them provide runways of sufficient length to accommodate jet airplanes. Most runways do not exceed 5,000 to 6,000 feet in length. But the safe operation of jet fighters and bombers requires a runway of 8,000 feet. Therefore, a very large portion of the Air Force funds must be devoted to making runways stronger, longer, and wider. In addition, parking aprons must be strengthened and enlarged. Alert hangars, engine test and repair facilities, training facilities, communications and navigational facilities, and numerous types of research and development facilities must be constructed.

During our consideration of the last military public works bill, we deleted the entire authorization for the construction of family quarters in continental United States. That deletion totaled more than $100,000,000. In the present bill, a total of 164 family quarters are authorized for continental United States, 42 for the Army—at an average cost of $16,700—and 122 for the Navy—at an average cost of approximately $17,000. In the case of the family quarters for the Army, they are all located at isolated communications facilities which must be manned on a 24-hour basis. Wherry projects are not feasible in these instances. The problems that the Services experience in obtaining and keeping qualified personnel at such isolated installations are not generally understood or apppreciated.

Title III contains two authorizations styled "And other construction", in the amount of $22,550,000 for continental United States, and $30,828,000 for outside continental United States. Under prevailing conditions, it is readily understandable that situations may arise which will necessitate immediate construction which cannot await normal legislative action without seriously impairing our defense efforts. So these authorizations are in the nature of emergency authorizations. It has been agreed between representatives of the Air Force and the Armed Services Committee that no project will be undertaken, pursuant to this particular authorization, until such project has been fully explained to the committee. It is likewise understood and agreed that the Air Force will not undertake the establishment of a separate Air Force Academy under this general authorization.

The committee has made four substantive amendments to the bill. The first of these amendments relates to the general category of ordnance facilities within continental United States in Title II. The general authorization for Navy ordnance facilities was increased in the amount of $226,600. The purpose for this increase is to permit the Navy to participate in the construction of a bridge across Portage Canal in Jefferson County, Wash., the total cost of the bridge being $311,000. Jefferson County, Wash., is to bear the remaining expense of $84,400 and to bear all future maintenance cost of the bridge. At the present time the Navy Ammunition Depot on Indian Island is serviced by a ferry operating between the mainland and the island. The cost to the Navy for annual maintenance of this ferry is approximately $50,000 per year. An additional factor to be considered is the fact that the ferry will need to be replaced within the foreseeable future. Therefore, this is a self-liquidating project and has been added in the interest of better service and economy.

This is a joint project between Jefferson County, Wash., and the Navy. The project has been contemplated for a long period of time. I understand that Jefferson County has done all of its share of it. That is, it is ready with its money to go ahead with the construction of it. The total cost is $311,000 and only $226,000 of it will fall on the Government, and it will also eliminate the item of $50,000 a year that the Government has been paying for operation.

The second substantive amendment relates to Air Force depots and logistical facilities in continental United States. That particular category has been increased in the amount of $10,000 to permit the Air Force to purchase 66.33 acres of land from the Federal Housing Administration at Robins Air Force Base, Ga., in order to accommodate a Wherry housing project. Under existing law Federal Housing Administration cannot transfer this property to the Air Force without the receipt of reasonable market value of the property.

The third substantive amendment relates to research and development and test facilities of the Air Force. Within that general category the Air Force had included $800,000 for preliminary plans for the establishment of an Air Force medical center at a site not yet chosen. The ultimate project would have cost in excess of $25,000,000. In view of this fact, the committee felt that a far more detailed justification should be made than time presently permits. Therefore, the Committee deleted $800,000 from that general authorization of the Air Force.

That is a new project on the part of the Air Force and is not, in my personal opinion, an emergency item. We feel it may be necessary. We do not know. But we want a special bill on it. It is not an emergency item.

The final amendment is contained in a new section which is designated section 407. The committee has been disturbed over the disposal of military property, both real and personal, which would now be helpful in our national defense efforts, and feels that some additional restriction should be placed on such disposals. The inclusion of personal property within a disposal prohibition would create such a severe administrative burden on the military services that the committee has refrained from including it at this time. However, a prohibition against the disposal of real property acquired by the Army, the Navy, or the Air Force, pursuant to this or any previous act, is contained in the committee amendment. The amendment provides that such disposals can only be made by act of Congress, passed subsequent to the enactment of this act. In the interest of clarity, it should also be pointed out that the term "equipment" in this new section does not refer to strictly military equipment such as that being furnished under the MDAP program, but rather machine-type equipment such as catapults, and so forth, which are installed on real estate or in buildings to be erected under this act, and, therefore become fixtures, in the legal sense, to such real estate.

This legislation has been approved by the Bureau of the Budget and is recommended by the Department of Defense. It has been approved by a unanimous vote of the Committee on the Armed Services and is emergency legislation designed to further the expansion of our military force. I feel that it should be adopted at this time.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, H. R. 9893 is a short bill of only seven pages, but it deals in the aggregate with scores, if not hundreds, of every type and kind of project and construction imaginable. These two huge volumes here contain the list of all these projects scattered over continental United States and some in other countries, the Philippines, Korea, Japan, Germany; some of them highly classified projects with justification for each.

I want the Members of the House to understand that our Committee on Armed Services went through each of these two huge volumes very carefully and insisted that the witnesses from the different branches of the armed services appearing before us give full justification for each one of these projects: All kinds of warehouses, depots, proving grounds, storage facilities, water supply, and other projects I do not care to discuss on the floor of the House or in public. They are highly classified. No doubt there is some pork in them.

I think that at all times the American people should remain cool, calm, and collected; but in this sad, sick, and war-torn world we should not become jittery or panicky; at the same time I think we need to make our people feel and realize much more fully than they do the deadly peril that confronts us. I think our painful experience in Korea has certainly demonstrated beyond the shadow of a doubt that this country of 150,000,000 people and 3,000,000 square miles of territory cannot forever support more than 2,000,000,000 people in all the other countries of the world.

As this year ends, I think perhaps we need to take a new inventory and have a reappraisal of America's capacity, as to what we can do. It may be that we shall have to shorten and tighten and strengthen our lines of defense; certainly it is obvious that we cannot hope to match the manpower of the Asiatic Continent. Certainly the hour has arrived when we need to think a little more of our own defense here in the United States and less of other countries.

Personally I found very little will among the different nations and peoples I have visited on several occasions since the close of World War II—the people in continental Europe—I found very little disposition or will to offer resistance. Seriously, I doubt whether the peoples in Western Europe, the Low Countries, including Scandinavia, have the will to fight regardless of the materials and supplies that we send them. Is Russia waiting for us to build up a richer prize for her to seize? Perhaps I should not make that statement in this critical hour, but I think it is a fact. Unpleasant as it may be, we have to face it.

I am glad to tell the Committee that the money that we authorize in this particular bill is not for foreign nations but for our own national defense. It totals $1,658,000,000. The Congress already has appropriated more than $1,400,000,000. So this is merely to authorize most of the money that has already been appropriated. Congratulations to Appropriations Committee. Thank God this money is to be spent mostly in our own country and only in foreign spots where it is absolutely necessary for the defense and protection of America and of Americans.

This legislation is so badly needed that I do not want to consume another minute's time; in fact, I think we should vote unanimously for this bill and we should get to work on these projects because they already are overdue.

Mr. Chairman, I now yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ARENDS].

Mr. ARENDS. Mr. Chairman, I have a letter from my colleague from Illinois [Mr. SIMPSON] which reads as follows:

> DEAR LES: As I am unavoidably absent today, I wish you would please state on the floor my position in favor of the two bills enacted, H. R. 9798 and H. R. 9893.
>
> Sincerely yours,
>
> SID SIMPSON.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, though I have the greatest respect for the judgment of my colleagues and desire to follow along every time I can, I was forced to cast a negative vote on the previous bill. The roll call disclosed I was the only dumb one who voted against it. I voted against it because the money and energy to implement it will not be used in the war effort but rather for boondoggling, as similar funds were used in World War II, and to protect people who will need no immediate protection.

Well, when the boondogglers get through and we criticize some needless wasteful expenditures that have been made under it, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, the majority leader, gets up and states, "You voted for it," I can reply, "I did not." I had no part in the wasteful expenditure of funds which were so badly needed for the support of those who are doing the fighting for the amusement, the entertainment of civilians.

If I understand this bill now before the House correctly, it provides in a very minor degree for the building of certain war facilities abroad. With that I can gladly go along. I want to say now, and I am talking primarily to my people, that when it is an appropriation for our national defense I will go along no matter what that appropriation may be; but I just cannot go along with legislation which will be used, as so much legislation has been and as so many appropriations have been used to purchase political support. Nor do I propose to be frightened into giving a blank check for authority to a bureaucrat every time the administration yells "Wolf." If I understand correctly from what my colleagues have said, this is a defense measure, just that, nothing else. That being the purpose of the bill, I vote for it with a clear conscience.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. WIER].

Mr. WIER. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to inject any foreign matter into this discussion at the present time, but because of my interest and my experience last year in the investigation and the drawing up of legislation for children in the Federal impact districts, particularly some that will be involved in this bill, I am compelled to say one or two things. Under the terms of this bill the appropriation for the needs of federally impacted districts, where these new installations or increased installations take place, will have to be increased, more money will be needed. It is my thinking or at least my hope the Committee on the Armed Services of the House and Senate will insist where the military puts up permanent installations, has troops permanently housed there, a part of the bill shall make it mandatory that the school facility shall be a part of the project to take care of the prospective children coming from that project. I do not think this impact should be placed upon the local school districts. I think the military should take care of some of it.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. I am glad the gentleman brought up that point because we have some provisions in this bill for schools.

Mr. WIER. I was asking for that information. I think we have to take cognizance that if we are going to have thousands of men and children at military installations, the Government itself has to put up the school construction.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman is absolutely correct, and I am happy to inform him that we do have some items in this bill for that particular purpose.

Mr. WIER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARY].

Mr. GARY. Mr. Chairman, when the vote was taken on the civil defense bill today, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ABBITT] and I were attending a conference at the ECA offices, and consequently could not be present. Had we been present, we would have voted "aye."

Mr. WIER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I make the same announcement. I was in the back room and did not hear the bell.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, we have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.—

TITLE I

SEC. 101. The Secretary of the Army, under the direction of the Secretary of Defense, is authorized to establish or develop military installations and facilities by the construction, conversion, installation, or equipment of temporary or permanent public works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, and utilities, as follows:

CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES

Facilities for Army Field Force stations, $79,722,525; facilities for United States Military Academy, $1,057,400; advance design of future construction projects for Army Field Force stations or United States Military Academy, $1,000,000; facilities for technical service stations as follows: Ordnance Corps, $38,025,275; Quartermaster Corps, $23,277,600; Chemical Corps, $21,129,000; Signal Corps, $44,814,500; Corps of Engineers, $11,677,600; Transportation Corps, $10,956,200; Finance Corps, $23,242,000; Adjutant General's Corps, $2,900,000; Army Medical Service, $8,663,200; classified construction, $20,000,000; advance design for future construction projects for technical service stations, $2,000,000; and acquisition of land or real property, $3,295,500.

OUTSIDE CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES

Alaska, $28,105,600; Japan, $4,415,000; Hawaii, $923,900; United States Army, Europe, $53,111,600; United States forces, Austria, $4,080,000; and advance design of future construction projects for overseas bases, $1,000,000.

TITLE I–A

SEC. 102. The Secretary of the Army, under the direction of the Secretary of Defense, is authorized to establish or develop military installations and facilities by the construction, conversion, installation, or equipment of temporary or permanent public works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, and utilities, as follows:

SPECIAL WEAPONS PROJECT

Construction at classified installations, $7,500,000.

TITLE II

SEC. 201. The Secretary of the Navy, under the direction of the Secretary of Defense, is authorized to establish or develop naval installations and facilities by the construction, conversion, installation, or equipment of temporary or permanent public works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, and utilities, as follows:

CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES

Fleet facilities, $5,460,380; aviation facilities, $226,913,000; Marine Corps facilities, $30,055,000; ordnance facilities, $43,237,880; medical facilities, $478,000; supply facilities, $5,490,000; communication facilities, $7,062,750; classified facilities, $6,000,000; and advance planning, $2,625,000.

OUTSIDE CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES

Alaska advance planning, $660,000; fleet facilities, $7,430,700; aviation facilities, $31,542,500; Marine Corps facilities, $1,500,000; ordnance facilities, $300,000; supply facilities, $1,950,000; and communication facilities, $10,723,500.

TITLE III

SEC. 301. The Secretary of the Air Force, under the direction of the Secretary of Defense, is authorized to establish or develop installations and facilities by the construction, conversion, installation, or equipment of temporary or permanent public works, including buildings, facilities, appurtenances, and utilities, as follows:

CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES

Operational support facilities, $199,654,000; training facilities, $133,782,000; depots and logistical facilities, $58,644,000; communications and navigational aid facilities, $8,432,000; research and development and test facilities, $23,664,000; classified facilities, $5,531,000; and other construction, $53,378,000.

OUTSIDE CONTINENTAL UNITED STATES

Operational support facilities, $263,497,000; depots and logistical facilities, $31,420,000; communications and navigational aid facilities, $26,535,000; and classified facilities, $14,870,000.

AIRCRAFT CONTROL AND WARNING SYSTEM

Facilities at classified locations, $66,987,000.

TITLE IV

GENERAL PROVISIONS

SEC. 401. The Secretary of the Army, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Air Force, under the direction of the Secretary of Defense, are respectively authorized, in order to establish or develop the installations and facilities as authorized by titles I, I–A, II, and III of this act, to acquire lands and rights pertaining thereto, or other interests therein, including the temporary use thereof, by donation, purchase, exchange of Government-owned lands, or otherwise, without regard to section 3648, Revised Statutes, as amended. When necessary, construction of a public works project authorized by this act may be commenced prior to approval of title to the underlying land by the Attorney General as required by section 355, Revised Statutes, as amended.

SEC. 402. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums of money as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of this act, but not to exceed:

(1) For public works authorized by title I: Inside continental United States, $291,760,800; outside continental United States, $91,636,100; or a total of $383,396,900;

(2) For public works authorized by title I–A: A total of $7,500,000;

(3) For public works authorized by title II: Inside continental United States, $327,322,010; outside continental United States, $54,106,700; or a total of $381,428,710; and

(4) For public works authorized by title III: Inside continental United States, $483,085,000; outside continental United States, $336,322,000; aircraft control and warning system facilities, $66,987,000, or a total of $886,394,000.

SEC. 403. The approximate cost indicated for each of the classes of projects enumerated and authorized by titles I, I–A, II, and III of this act may, in the discretion of the Secretary concerned, be varied upward or downward, but the total cost of the projects under each title shall not exceed the total appropriations authorized in respect of such title by section 402 of this act.

SEC. 404. No unit of family quarters with a net floor area in excess of 1,080 square feet shall be constructed under the authority of this act.

SEC. 405. Appropriations made to carry out the purposes of this act shall be available for expenses incident to construction, including administration, overhead, planning and supervision, and shall be available until expended when specifically provided in the appropriation act.

SEC. 406. Any projects authorized by this act may be prosecuted under direct appropriations or authority to enter into contracts in lieu of such appropriation.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 3, line 16, strike "$43,237,880" and insert "$43,464,480."

On page 4, lines 10 and 11, strike "$58,644,000" and insert "$58,654,000."

On page 4, line 13, strike "$23,664,000" and insert "$22,864,000."

On page 4, line 14, strike "$53,378,000" and insert "$22,550,000."

On page 4, line 19, strike "and."

On page 4, line 20, substitute a semicolon for the period and insert "and other construction, $30,828,000."

On page 6, line 3, strike "$327,322,010" and insert "$327,548,610."

On page 6, line 8, strike "$381,428,710" and insert "$381,655,310."

On page 6, line 10, strike "$483,085,000" and insert "$451,467,000."

On page 6, line 11, strike "$336,322,000" and insert "$367,150,000."

On page 6, line 13, strike "$886,394,000" and insert "$585,604,000."

On page 7, following line 9, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 407. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Departments of the Army, Navy, and Air Force may not grant or transfer to another Government department or agency other than a military department or to any other party any land or buildings of a permanent nature, or any interests in such property, except equipment no longer serviceable and except easements, leases, or permits deemed to be in the public interest, which shall have been acquired, constructed or installed pursuant to the provisions of this or any previous act except as authorized by an act of Congress enacted subsequent to the date of enactment of this act."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. PRIEST] having assumed the chair, Mr. GORE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9893) to authorize certain construction at military and naval installations, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. FURCOLO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 hour on tomorrow, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore granted.

OAKLAND NAVAL SUPPLY CENTER PROVIDES VITAL LOGISTICS SUPPORT FOR KOREAN WAR

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, the Naval Supply Center at Oakland, Calif., is one of the Navy's Bureau of Supplies and Accounts tidewater activities located on San Francisco Bay at Oakland's Middle Harbor in Alameda County, across the bay from the city of San Francisco and the Golden Gate. This installation which was commissioned just 8 days after Pearl Harbor, played a vital role in World War II in supplying, equipping, and feeding the vast Pacific Ocean area. It gained a tremendous amount of experience in materials handlings, packing, preservation, waterfront operations, and all the techniques, methods and know-how involved in a war of logistics. It boasted a record of meeting every shipping deadline on time, and getting the material where it was needed when it was needed.

When the Korean crisis broke, the Oakland Navy Supply Center, despite a big reduction in force which had cut its personnel down to a peacetime basis, possessed a tightly knit, highly skilled organization of trained logistics specialists, ready to proceed on an emergency basis at a moment's notice. Over 97 percent of the center's personnel are civilian employees.

The first step taken was to increase the basic workweek to 6 days, and to work around the clock 7 days a week in depots, branches, departments, divisions, sections, and units where the work load meant a 24-hour stint in order to meet rush deadlines. Requisitions started to pour into Oakland from the entire Pacific Ocean area as well as Pacific coast installations. From an average of 19,762 line items requisitioned during an average month prior to the Korean incident, the figure jumped to a staggering total of 97,803 line items requisitioned during the month of August 1950—an increase of 394 percent.

Everything from toothpicks to turbines was shipped out in a never-ending stream of supplies.

It is 5,000 miles from Oakland, Calif., across the vast stretches of the Pacific Ocean to Pusan, in Korea. It took lots of ships loaded to the gunwales with all sorts of supplies to get those supplies to the forward area in condition to be used immediately.

From the farms and factories of America the supplies were shipped out to the Pacific coast via train, truck, and plane. Oakland, Calif., by virtue of its central location, received a major portion of these supplies. Three transcontinental railroads plus innumerable truck and air freight lines also brought the materials in from Navy inland depots and supply points to the Oakland Naval Supply Center.

With an over-all workload increase of better than 217 percent, additional personnel were urgently and swiftly required to help run the intricate logistics chain which stretched half way around the world. Oakland and its surrounding communities provided that help in the form of a 17-percent personnel increase to accomplish that 271-percent workload increase—this to augment the 6-day workweek.

These employees, trained on the job by their supervisors, rolled up their sleeves and pitched in to keep the supplies and equipment moving steadily and smoothly.

During the month of August, for example, the center handled a total of 234,754 measurement-tons of material—a 111 percent increase over the 1948 base figure. This included the loading of 52 vessels—including 11 at commercial piers—as well as 71 Navy and commercial barges and yard craft, 205 rail cars, and 1,439 commercial and Navy trucks. Unloading operations included 30 vessels—including 24 at commercial piers—180 Navy and commercial barges and yard craft, 259 rail cars, and 1,157 commercial and Navy trucks. The fact that Navy barges and small craft were readily available was a large contributing factor in the speedy and efficient water-front operations.

Luckily for the Nation, much of the material needed overseas in a desperate hurry was already inside of the huge storehouses at the Oakland naval supply center and was shipped out in the first wave of supplies. This gave the center valuable time to order and receive replenishment material in time to get it loaded aboard ships returning from the forward areas for their second shuttle trip to the fighting zone.

The Navy's civil-service employees proved that they could produce under unusual, pressing, and rush conditions as well as under what is called normal conditions. At the Oakland naval supply center, the civil-service stevedore gangs especially merit a pat on the back for a job well done. They worked on a 24-hour-a-day, 7-day-a-week basis, loading among their tonnage better than 500,000 different items of supply of every shape, size, and weight imaginable. This included a great deal of fragile material such as radar and plane parts.

The supply center's trained nucleus of civil service stevedores was augmented by contract stevedores to meet the peak load placed on the center. Once again, the importance of the availability of contract services the Navy was demonstrated. The commercial contract stevedores and the commercial tug barge, and heavy lift equipment operators contributed in no small way to the ability of the supply center to meet the impact of the Korean war. The operators of commercial harbor equipment also played an important part in the center's ability to cope with the almost overnight tripling of the demand for movement of supplies and equipment overseas. The availability of Navy personnel, both civilian and military, and Navy-owned equipment in actual operation explained the ability of the center to cope with the unprecedented suddenness of the load thrown upon it. It was a combination of this availability of personnel and equipment in service, and the extension of their hours of work that made the record of the center possible.

An outstanding example of some of the problems which arose during the months of June, July, and August was the complete outfitting of 11 reactivated ships sent to the Oakland naval supply center by the Military Sea Transportation Service for complete stores and materials. This entailed an unbelievable amount of work. Some of the ships needed as many as 2,500 mattresses, 2,500 pillows, 5,000 blankets, 165 tons of general stores, 700 tons of provisions, 4,500 bunks, and as high as 7,000 separate line items. Getting these ships ready for sea on time, with everything in its proper place, was a challenge which the Oakland naval supply center's personnel met successfully. All 11 vessels, fresh out of the "mothball" fleet, were outfitted by the naval supply center within a period of only 10 days.

The streamlining and centralization which the center had started after the last war paid off in big dividends. As an example, labor and equipment is handled by one department, packing by another, instead of having each depot with its own groups of laborers and packers. This basic purpose of increased flexibility for greater efficiency and more expeditious handling of materials proved highly successful. Each component at the center had its distinct job to do. Each was a vital link in the big chain closely interwoven with all the others and all working together in unison toward one big goal.

The Korean incident proved conclusively that the Navy's concept of supply, which provides for a concentration of material in one area, at a naval supply center, was sound, and was capable of meeting the acid test. The Oakland naval supply center provided materials not only for overseas, but also for shore installations up and down the Pacific coast.

The foresight and good planning on the part of the Navy's Bureau of Supplies and Accounts in having the material readily available at the naval supply center, Oakland, which is the primary logistics activity on the Pacific coast, was one of the main factors in getting the material out to the Pacific Ocean area in such speedy fashion.

The development of this machine that works so smoothly and so efficiently was the responsibility of Rear Adm. Murrey L. Royar. Admiral Royar commands the loyalty of the personnel at the naval supply center at Oakland. He earned the respect of the people throughout California.

As long as the emergency continues, the naval supply center is ready to accomplish its mission of servicing the Pacific Ocean area with material, equipment, supplies, and provisions. This installation as well as the entire Oakland area, which includes a big section of Alameda County, Calif., has proved once again that it is ready to cope with any situation that may arise.

TRANSPORTATION OF GAMBLING DEVICES

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 3357) to prohibit transportation of gambling devices in interstate and foreign commerce, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of the managers on the part of the House be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. NO. 3111)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3357) to prohibit transportation of gambling devices in interstate and foreign commerce, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, and agree to the same.

DWIGHT L. ROGERS,
LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
J. PERCY PRIEST,
JAMES I. DOLLIVER,
JOHN B. BENNETT,
Managers on the Part of the House.

ED C. JOHNSON,
ERNEST MCFARLAND,
JOHN J. WILLIAMS,
Managers on the Part of the Senate.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 3357) to prohibit transportation of gambling devices in interstate and foreign commerce, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The amendment of the House No. 1 substituted for the definition of "gambling device" contained in the bill as passed by the Senate a new and more restrictive definition of "gambling device".

It further defined the terms "State" and "possession of the United States".

It further substituted for section 2 of the bill as passed by the Senate a new section 2 which permitted any State (as defined in section 1) to exempt itself from the prohibition contained in this section with respect to transportation of gambling devices to any place in such State or to any place in a subdivision of such State.

House amendments Nos. 2 and 3 substituted "Attorney General" for "Collector of Internal Revenue" as the Federal official with whom manufacturers of, and dealers in, gambling devices must register and file certain information.

House amendments Nos. 4, 5, and 6, eliminated Territories from the prohibition contained in section 5 and brought within that prohibition the special maritime and territorial jurisdiction of the United States as defined in section 7 of title 18 of the United States Code.

House amendments Nos. 7 and 8 made uniform the penalties for the violation of sections 2, 3, 4, and 5 of the bill.

The Senate recedes from its disagreement on all of the House amendments.

The House conferees rejected two amendments proposed by the Senate conferees. The first amendment would have permitted the use of gambling devices as defined in the bill in any place owned or controlled by the United States if such place is in a State or subdivision thereof which has enacted a law providing for the exemption of such State or such subdivision from the provisions of section 2 of the bill. The second amendment would have permitted a State which has enacted a law providing for the exemption of such State from the provisions of section 2 of the bill to ship gambling devices from such State for repairs into another State.

The House conferees felt that these two amendments are incompatible with the objectives of this legislation.

DWIGHT L. ROGERS,
LINDLEY BECKWORTH,
J. PERCY PRIEST,
JAMES I. DOLLIVER,
JOHN B. BENNETT,
Managers on the Part of the House.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. I yield.

Mr. HUGH D. SCOTT, JR. Will the gentleman explain the bill?

Mr. ROGERS of Florida. This bill has been fully discussed heretofore on the floor of the House and has also been fully discussed in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The other body first passed the bill and sent it to the House. The House passed it with amendments. Conferees were appointed and it went back to the other body where they agreed to the bill as amended by the House. In other words, the House has passed on every provision of this bill. For the specific information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania this is a bill prohibiting the transportation of slot machines or gambling devices through the channels of interstate commerce. This is the outcome of the conference with the attorneys general and prosecuting attorneys throughout the entire Nation. They met here in Washington. The bill is the result of that conference. It has been agreed to by the other body. I would like to read the letter from Attorney General McGrath which was sent to Senator JOHNSON who had charge of the bill in the other body. He says:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am most desirous that the Senate promptly and favorably consider the bill S. 3357 to prohibit the interstate transportation of gambling devices. To that end I request your cooperation by calling up the conference report on the bill as soon as practical. The desirability and the need for this legislation is self-evident and becoming more apparent with each passing day.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe anyone has any objection to this legislation because it does not in any way interfere with States' rights. If a State desires to permit gambling by the use of these slot machines within the confines of the State or Territory they can do that. This prohibits the use of the channels of interstate commerce for the shipment of these gambling devices. Therefore, I hope the conference report will be adopted.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR A NATIONAL CALL TO PRAYER ON SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1950

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I am authorized by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask for the immediate consideration of House Resolution 886.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas our country is in an hour of dire danger in which hostile forces, acting without conscience and guided by a godless ideology, threaten the very survival of our cherished institutions; and

Whereas, while we must mobilize our material resources to meet this threat, we are also deeply conscious of the fact that the moral and spiritual resources of our people constitute the Nation's great bulwark in times of national crisis; and

Whereas the churches of the Nation, of all creeds and faiths, are the instruments through which our moral and spiritual resources can best be marshaled and given strength: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the House of Representatives suggests that the churches of the Nation, of all creeds and faiths, set aside and dedicate Sunday, December 24, 1950, as a time for prayers and supplication for divine guidance of the men and women, elected and appointed, civilian and military, on whose shoulders rests the responsibility for leadership in this time of great crisis, and for strength and unity to enable our people to persevere, with other freedom-loving people, in the effort to bring about peace and justice in the world.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRYSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. BRYSON: Strike out all of the "Resolved" clause beginning with line 1, page 1, through line 6 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Resolved, That the House of Representatives call upon the people of the commonwealth of all creeds and faiths, to observe Sunday, December 24, 1950, as a time of prayer and supplication to the God who hath made and preserved us a Nation. And that on this day, so designated, our citizenship repair to the churches of their choice to invoke divine guidance for the men and women elected and appointed, civilian and military, on whose shoulders rests the responsibility for leadership in this time of great crisis and for strength and unity to enable our people to persevere, with other freedom-loving people, in the crusade to bring about peace and justice in the world."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. HALLECK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 hour on Monday, January 1, 1951, following the legislative business of the day and any other special orders heretofore entered.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution (H. Res. 890) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That appropriations under the heading "Contingent expenses of the House, 1951" shall be available for such additional numbers of books, pamphlets, and documents as the Doorkeeper may find necessary to complete allotments to Members.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HAVENNER asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a letter.

Mrs. HARDEN asked and was given permission to extend her remarks and include a sermon.

Mr. BARRETT of Pennsylvania asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks.

Mr. HOWELL asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.

Mr. CARNAHAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and include a newspaper article.

Mr. JONES of North Carolina asked and was given permission to extend his remarks on the subject of a commendation of report of Subcommittee on Appropriations for Armed Services, headed by Representative GEORGE H. MAHON.

Mr. KENNEDY (at the request of Mr. HOWELL) was given permission to extend his remarks in two instances.

SPECIAL ORDER

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

(Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include a letter and two editorials.)

THE STAR DEFENDS ACHESON, CRITICIZES REPUBLICANS

Mr. HOFFMAN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, an editorial in the Sunday Washington Star under the caption "A reckless gesture," charges that Republicans of Senate and House for partisan advantage were guilty of a disservice to the interests of the country in this critical period when they insisted that Acheson had lost the confidence of the people and called for his resignation.

The editorial apparently proceeds on the theory that the present administration is untouchable, its policies and administrators should not be criticized, even though the policies which it is following give promise of the destruction of the people's welfare, threatens the very existence of the Republic.

The line followed by the Star in this editorial, a copy of which is attached hereto and made a part hereof is that used by the New Deal and its supporters ever since its inception. The slightest disagreement is attributed to unworthy motives, a lack of intelligence.

The New Deal, the one-worlders, and the internationalists have all proceeded on the theory that no one other than themselves had any concept of the Nation's needs nor of the domestic or foreign policy which this country should follow, which would but serve our country's welfare.

Professing adherence to the two-party system, vociferously announcing its belief in the right of a free press and free speech, nevertheless, they charged with either ignorance or disloyalty those who differed with, who ventured to criticize, the objectives or methods of the New Deal, the possible consequence of the adoption of the policies of the one-worlders or the internationalists.

Note the intolerance of, the inconsistencies in, the Star editorial: In the first paragraph it concedes that Acheson and the State Department may have lost the confidence of Congress and of the American people. In the next paragraph, adopting the methods of the New Deal, the self-satisfied internationalists, it charges that the reason for the adoption by the Republicans of the resolution calling for the removal of Mr. Acheson, is not the existence of this lack of confidence—which it admits may and which does exist—but rather that the Republicans were playing politics. The Star will not even give Republicans the benefit of a doubt—it assumes we acted from unworthy motives.

The editorial then argues that any lack of confidence in Mr. Acheson is due to a preelection "get Acheson" campaign. That argument is an insult to the intelligence of the American people.

Assuming that extravagant and perhaps untruthful statements were, during the campaign, made both against and for Mr. Acheson, surely with the aid of the press, the editors, the columnists, and the radio commentators, the American people had an opportunity and the ability to weigh the evidence and form sound judgment.

Prior to the election, the people for months were advised of Mr. Acheson's foreign policy and of the results of that policy. Many of the larger newspapers—the Star and the Post here in Washington—went all out for Mr. Acheson and his foreign policy. The people knew that Mr. Acheson and Mr. Truman denied that there were Communists in the administration, that those Communists were solicitous, not for the welfare of America, but were more concerned with serving the interests of other countries.

It was a fact—a fact finally admitted by almost everyone, that Alger Hiss, endorsed and supported by those high in the administration, betrayed the interests of his country and finally was convicted of perjury. Yet, after his conviction, Mr. Acheson, publicly, while Secretary of State, announced that he would not turn his back on Hiss. When Acheson, after the conviction of Hiss, after knowledge that he had served a potential enemy, publicly adhered to his friendship for Hiss, he damned himself in the eyes of the American people—he lost their confidence.

After Mr. Truman charged that Republican efforts to oust Communists from policy-making positions in the Government were just a "red herring" and subsequent events disclosed the necessity for a house cleaning, the American people arrived at the conviction that Mr. Truman was either ignorant or indifferent to an existing dangerous situation in his own administration. Many then lost confidence in him.

When the administration's armed services and the State Department told the American people that we did not need and could not hold Korea, and Mr. Truman then, at the request of United Nations, ordered our Armed Forces into world war III, the American people knew that again the administration was either incompetent to serve, or indifferent to, our Nation's welfare.

When the cost of that incompetence or indifference was the lives of thousands of American boys, their lack of confidence mushroomed into bitter indignation and resentment.

It requires no stretch of the imagination to believe that had the election occurred after December 1, and had Mr. Truman been a candidate at that time, there would have been a Republican Eighty-second Congress, Mr. Truman overwhelmingly repudiated — another President in the White House in 1951.

It is unfortunate that Mr. Truman could not have been ousted by a vote of a lack of confidence. Mr. Truman went to the country, as did the Vice President, and practically all of his supporters, asking for a vote of confidence. They failed to get it.

This editorial complains because the resolution adopted by both the Senate and House Republicans, expressing a lack of confidence in Mr. Acheson, does not carry specifications of the charges against Mr. Acheson. The specific charges against Mr. Acheson were made in and out of Congress long before the election. The one-worlders, the supporters of United Nations and the press which went along with Acheson and Truman, presented to the people their defense of those charges. That defense failed.

Instead of accepting the verdict of the people at the polls, Acheson, the President and those who say he must be unquestioningly supported, now charge that the demand for the resignation of Mr. Acheson was conceived in an attempt to gain partisan advantage, made and supported, without regard to the welfare of the people.

That charge is the usual smear charge of the self-satisfied and intolerant. It is unworthy of and not made by real Democrats.

The Star, in further defense of Mr. Acheson, in further condemnation of Republicans, states that when condemning the Acheson policies, "The Republicans in Congress should have named them—spelling them out, as indictments of the man to be punished. But, of course, this could not be done." As pointed out above, the charges were, prior to the election, spelled out in detail.

A bill of particulars could easily be given. The "spelling out" of just one is sufficient to justify the ousting of Acheson, the impeachment of Harry S. Truman.

Permit me to give you the facts, and, they cannot be, they are not, disputed. The State Department and our military authorities told the people that we did not need, that we did not want Korea. Our military authorities told our people that we could not, by force, hold Korea against an assault.

Nevertheless, when the North Koreans went into South Korea, Mr. Truman—without consulting Congress, without any demand from the American people, who must furnish the manpower, at the request of the Security Council and the United Nations—ordered our Armed Forces to throw back the North Koreans, to invade their territory. Mr. Truman took us, without the consent of Congress, by the exercise of arbitrary power, into world war III.

The editorial continued:

For Republicans in Congress, or most of them, have supported these policies, helped to implement them by the expenditure of billions of dollars approved by Congress.

What an unfair criticism. True, some Republicans did go along because they were told time and again that their cooperation was necessary to save the country, to bring about world peace, that if they did not go along they were traitors to their own country.

That brand of smear brought some Republicans to heel. Even so, it does not lie in the mouth of the Star or of those who insisted upon Republicans supporting or refraining from criticism of Acheson's foreign policy, to now condemn them because they went along, joined the "bipartisan" "me too" brigade. The administration and one-worlders damned Republicans who did not "join up." They now would silence those who did and now find themselves in a dilemma they helped create.

Acceptance of the Star's demand would forever silence administration critics, no matter how ruinous its acts. The Star charges that the adoption of the resolution was but a continuation of what it characterizes as "the smear which supported the preelection campaign against Mr. Acheson."

The election of Mr. TAFT is proof that the rendition of real service to the people's interest is the way to the people's confidence—that Mr. Acheson did not give—therefore, he lost their confidence.

This editorial says that the resolution adopted by the Republicans of the Senate and the House has "a far more injurious effect on the country than on Mr. Acheson." That is nonsense. All one needs to do to repudiate the argument followed in this editorial is to read the mail of any Senator or Congressman. Such a reading will disclose that the people want no more of Mr. Acheson or of Mr. Truman and his foreign policy.

Letters by the hundreds are coming to Congressmen in which those who are doing the fighting, who have sons, fathers, husbands, or brothers in the war or about to be called in the war, among others ask the following questions:

First. For what are we fighting?

Second. For whose benefit are we fighting?

Third. What will be the effect of this war upon the Nation's future?

Fourth. Is this war being fought for America, its people, or is it being fought to protect, advance the interest, of a nation, of a group of other nations?

Fifth. Can world war III be won and what will we have when it is over—what will we have accomplished?

The editorial further states that if Acheson is forced out of office, "It will mean that an able public servant has been hounded out of office by accusations that for the most part are unnamed and unproved, accusations which are given color only by a dangerous sort of irresponsibility that suggests hysteria." The contrary is true. If Mr. Acheson is forced out of office it will mean that at long last the author of our foreign policy has, by the American people, been weighed in the balance and found wanting. It will mean that the man who aided in the defeat of the Chinese Nationalists, the strengthening of the Chinese Communists—who followed too often and too long the appeasement wishes of England and France, no longer will formulate our foreign policy.

May I say to my colleagues, my duty is to serve the interests of my country and to do it in the way my people want it done. I owe no superior obligation to any editor, any group, any other nation.

The people know, the men who are fighting abroad know, that Mr. Acheson and Mr. Truman are responsible for the country's present danger.

It is no answer to charge that some Republicans followed a "me too" policy—a course the administration begged them to take.

The people cannot now get at Mr. Truman, but they can demand Mr. Acheson's removal.

Self-preservation does not demand that we blindly follow Mr. Truman. Self-preservation demands that we repudiate his policy of giving away our resources, bleeding ourselves white as Joe Stalin demands. Self-preservation demands that we conserve our manpower and in an intelligent, effective way, prepare a national defense which will make our Nation secure.

Mr. Truman, Mr. Acheson, the one-worlders, the internationalists will not consider the facts; they insist that 150,000,000 people should not only "rehabilitate" the rest of the world, but that we fight in every war no matter what the cause, the prospect of success, no matter what the cost to us. They will not accept the hard fact that we cannot successfully wage war in Asia against the Chinese and Russians, in Europe against Russia and her allies, that our so-called allies will not wholeheartedly fight with us, that the moment it appears to be to their interest they will deal with Russia.

Our men have fought to the limit of their endurance in Korea, they have done all that men could do. They have been driven out of Korea. Let us keep them out.

Military men say we cannot hold Europe. They tell us that Stalin can overrun Western Europe to the sea in 30 or 60 days. Do you wish to sacrifice another 200,000 additional men by sending them to fight, many to die in Europe? Just how many men must be offered up in sacrifice to the internationalism of an Acheson, the stubborness of a Truman? Does Truman really believe our people will unite behind a policy which is futile, which calls for the death of perhaps a million or more men?

I hope when Herbert Hoover speaks tonight the President will listen and give heed. That the one-worlders and the internationalists will see the error of their way. That the people's representatives will think and act on the advice of the first President. Get our men out of Asia, out of Europe, defend the Western Hemisphere and only such outlying territory as may be absolutely essential to our national welfare, the Republic's security.

Indicating that the Republican resolution does not go far enough to express the will of the people, the desire of the people for the ouster of Mr. Acheson, permit me to read a few excerpts from two editorials and just one typical letter similar to those received by most Members:

SAUGATUCK, MICH., December 14, 1950.
Hon. CLARE E. HOFFMAN,
Fourth District, Michigan,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HOFFMAN: I am enclosing this editorial from the Herald-American. You have probably had it called to your attention already.

I should like to add a few points to it however. Our President is now making speeches and statements that even a high-school student would consider juvenile. We are being told that the people will have to become aware of the seriousness of the situation that exists and that the people will have to make more sacrifices in days to come. He is either mad, stupid, or just taking the usual political "out" of shunting his blind mistakes off on the people. Does he consider those boys who have fought such a desperate battle on Korea as the people? You don't fight and die in battle without becoming aware of the dangers that exist. And the parents and wives of those boys know the mental anguish that is felt when a boy is killed. Are they the people? When tragedy strikes close at home you realize the seriousness with every beat of a broken heart.

What clearer answer could he have that the people of America have awakened to the facts than the repudiation of his policies in the November elections?

I have reached middle age and begin to find myself in the category of the older generation. How do you answer the questions of the young people who ask "Why didn't you do something about it? You had the power to change the course? Well, I've decided I won't sit back and not raise a finger—not only will I raise my finger but I'll shake my fist and yell my head off until something is done to rid this country of second-rate, double-talking fools.

Harry Truman will not be able to wrap the Presidential cloak of immunity around him forever. The long arm of the American people can still reach into the White House and lead him by the nose back to Independence to join the other Missouri mules.

If there were any hope that the present administration could take hold of the situation and face it with wisdom and honesty there would be no cause for harsh criticism, but each day takes us closer to imminent danger and the double talk gets us no closer to a solution.

In the name of Heaven don't let universal military training get sidetracked in the next Congress.

I am an American who is mad as a hornet and there are many more like me.

Earnestly yours.

OUR AMERICAN DUTY

(Reprinted from last Tuesday's Chicago Herald-American)

The blundering and disloyal "foreign policies" of the New Deal are taking this country into complete disaster—both military and economic.

Our sovereignty has been impaired by making us a virtual vassal of the United Nations, which disrupts our councils, and seeks to fly its mongrel flag over our public buildings.

Our wealth is dissipated to support socialism abroad and to defend alien peoples who are not willing to defend themselves.

The lives of our young men are being sacrificed in a desperate war which our purported allies are not trying to help us win on the battlefields and are conspiring to make us lose in the mazes of diplomacy—and duplicity.

For our own survival, it is imperative that we extricate ourselves from these destroying situations at once.

* * * * *

Without even inadequate support from others in the United Nations, we are fighting almost alone against massed hordes on the Asian Continent.

Continuing the war means only the slaughter of millions in a quixotic American attempt to conquer a vast and distant population.

First and foremost, therefore, this country should withdraw its Armed Forces from the invasion areas.

We should get our troops out of Korea as quickly as possible.

We should come home to our own country, reconstruct our defenses, and give heed to our own security and welfare.

This might be a defeat for the New Deal, which is responsible for our dismal plight.

It would not be a defeat for the United States, but merely an act of self-preservation.

Secondly, we should get out of the United Nations.

That organization has not sustained us in the war that we undertook in its behalf.

Instead, it has interfered with our operations.

Furthermore, it is conniving to admit the enemy into a privileged membership where the enemy could dictate peace terms.

Accordingly, the United Nations should let Red China in—and leave the United States out.

Then let the United Nations see how it gets along.

This country has maintained the United Nations since its inception, with no return in loyalty or gratitude.

So let those who run the United Nations pay for the United Nations—and fight its wars.

Finally, we should end our unrequited efforts to support and supply an ingrate Europe.

Even England, our supposedly stanch ally, has not genuinely backed us in our solitary United Nations war, nor assisted us elsewhere.

On the contrary, Marxist England formally recognized the Chinese Communist Government, and collaborates with Marxist France in preventing a European rearmament.

Europe has intimated it no longer wants our martial help.

This is Europe's attitude, let Europe look out for itself, and see how Europe gets along.

Since obviously we stand alone, we should have the wisdom and the courage to act alone.

For our duty is to protect our own people and to foster our own Nation.

BENTON HARBOR CORPORAL DESCRIBES FIGHT—RICHARD LANCASTER IN CENTER OF GORY 50-MILE TREK TO KOREAN PORT

United States Marine Corp. Richard Lancaster, 20, trapped somewhere in the vicinity of Changjin Reservoir December 4 by overwhelming forces of Chinese Reds, sat down and wrote a letter to his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Kenneth Lancaster, of 1304 Seneca Road, Benton Harbor.

The Lancasters read their son's letter this morning, not knowing whether he was among the 25,000 marines and doughboys who broke through the Reds today after a bitter 50-mile battle of annihilation.

Following is text of the letter:

"DEAR MOM, DAD, AND FAMILY: I'm writing you under rather tough conditions—but if I don't write now, I may not get the chance again. As you probably know, the First, Fifth, and Seventh Marine Regiments of the First Division are in the Chosin sector now; but if things don't change damn quick, there won't be any regiments or even a division left in 48 hours.

"In the last 36 hours we—the Fifth Marines—have had almost 600 men killed, and almost all of us are wounded or frostbitten. Yesterday I caught shrapnel from a grenade in the arms and chest—I'm just lucky it wasn't more serious, because I haven't had r- much as a bar l aid to cov r the wounds as yet. We're fortunate to have cold weather, in a way—no worry of bleeding to death, anyway.

"I don't know what you've heard back home, but, believe me, it's horrible over here. For one thing, we are terrifically outnumbered—the last estimate was about 23 to 1. Another thing, these Chinese gooks are better armed and equipped than we are. They've got our weapons plus Russian weapons, and they're eating better than we are.

"In my original platoon there are four of us alive; the three guys I came with from South Bend who were in my platoon all got killed yesterday. The platoon sergeant and I were sharing a foxhole when a gook dropped a grenade right in; the sergeant was blown to bits and I was only scarcely wounded. As I told you before, we are totally outnumbered here. Well, last night the litter cases (seriously wounded) were put in rubber rafts and floated down the river to try to get through the gooks' lines and to field hospitals. This morning we get word that out of 420 guys 3 of them made it alive. The damn gooks made special targets of them as they were helpless to do anything about it. We couldn't send a large guard with them—we just couldn't spare the men.

"The First Division numbered close to 9,000 men; now we've got 2,200 able to fight—that included the wounded also. You may not believe this now, but sometime you ask a marine or an army guy who was in Korea, and then you'll find out the horrible truth.

"We don't have a chance over here—there's too many gooks to kill. It seems like when you shoot 1 he's got 10 to replace him. Yesterday morning, Captain Cook, our company CO, got his before he even got out of his sleeping bag. A gook caught him there and shot him up so bad you wouldn't have known he ever had a face—it was a rotten sight. I almost got sick. This probably sounds fantastic to you—it would have to me a few months ago—but now I know and I'll never forget it as long as I live.

"It's just a damn shame that the American people don't wake up and see what's going on. We're not just fighting the Koreans or the Chinese—we're fighting the Russians, too.

"I wish that you could not be here for just a few hours just to see what it's like; then you'd know what I mean. It's like a terrible nightmare that never stops. Ya' know, I'm now down to about 150 pounds. I always wanted to lose weight, but not like this. This is the first actual break we've had in fighting in 48 hours, and it's probably the last one we'll have for quite a while. The gooks are reforming for another try to break our lines and kill us, and if we don't get more replacements and supplies flown in they will.

"* * * I hope you received my Christmas presents all right—grandma and grandpa, also. Write and let me know. Ya' know, if we should ever get out of this alive, I should have a pot full of mail waiting for me. Tell Billy to be a good boy while I'm gone. Tell grandma and grandpa that this letter is to them, too, as I won't get a chance to write again for quite a while. Tell everyone hello for me—the Meskimens, Bakers, Lawrences, etc., and please, Mom, don't worry about me. I'm all right; I'm still alive.

"Well, till the next time, have a swell Christmas, and remember, I'll be thinking of all of you. 'Bye for now.

"Your son, with love,

"DICK."

A note telling young Lancaster's father what to do with insurance benefits in the event of the writer's death accompanied the letter.

Lancaster had only recently returned to his company after recovering from wounds suffered in earlier Korean fighting. The wounds he referred to in the letter received by his parents today are the second he sustained in the Korean campaign.

Lancaster was recalled from Reserve status to active duty with the marines last September. He had been attending the University of Missouri.

COUNSEL FROM MOSCOW

Not often does Soviet Russia favor the United States with good advice.

When this occurs, of course, the advice may be inadvertently given, in pursuance of Russian designs.

Nonetheless, we should not be disdainful to our own undoing.

If the advice is sound—duly considering its suspect source—it may be ultimate wisdom to accept its implications.

An historic example of such perverse kindness is the repeated Russian suggestion—made by Pravda in Moscow and by Foreign Minister Vishinsky at Lake Success—that we ought to get out of Korea, where we are fighting the immense Communist far-eastern alliance with only token aid from our nominal allies.

The Korean campaign is not a war that we can win, even though we have committed almost our entire Regular Army and Marine Corps into battle, and General MacArthur has evidently averted an American debacle for the third time by unsurpassed skill.

It is a war that can totally disrupt our rearmament by sacrificing our irreplaceable veteran land forces in hopeless combat with the inexhaustible hordes of the Orient.

Obviously, therefore, we should evacuate our divisions from Korea while the time remains to do so.

However, Soviet Russia's inverse advice applies much more widely than merely to the Korean War.

We are inveigled into the war, virtually alone, because of our irrational associations in the United Nations, and if we remain in the United Nations we will have other wars to fight alone in other quarters of the globe.

For the United Nations imposes all the obligations upon us and assumes none upon itself.

We foolishly entered the organization as its chief contributing member—financially speaking.

Now we are becoming its arsenal, as well as its universal commando.

And we do not have either the manpower or the material resources to police the whole world.

By every implication we should take the Russians' suggestion and return to our own American land and our own American policy of keeping out of foreign entanglements.

Let us not only get out of Korea—let us also get out of the United Nations.

And once out, let us stay out.

Let us realize that the United Nations is united in only one thing: in seeing how much it can get out of America without giving anything in return.

We should appreciate the advice that we are receiving.

It expresses a good American policy, whether it comes from the Russians or not; and would properly emanate from a good American President, if we had one.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on tomorrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

MRS. JUAN ANTONIO RIVERA ET AL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate which was read:

Senate Resolution 377

Resolved, That the Secretary be, and he is hereby, directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 5051) for the relief of Mrs. Juan Antonio Rivera, Mrs. Paul Valle Antelo, Mrs. Jorge Diaz Remero, Mrs. Otto Resse, and Mrs. Hugo Soria, together with the Senate engrossed amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

ORGANIZED MEDICINE—A DOCUMENTED RECORD OF OPPOSITION TO SOCIAL AND ECONOMIC PROGRESS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BIEMILLER] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BIEMILLER. Mr. Speaker, we stand engaged in a world-wide struggle for the mind of man. At home and abroad, democracy contends against Russian totalitarianism. In this global conflict we must reserve our deepest faith, not for armed might, but for truth and freedom and security. For these ideals in the end shall command the unconquerable loyalty of the human spirit.

As we mobilize we must buttress our defenses not only against communism, but its twin allies—poverty and insecurity. For communism breeds best where human needs go unmet, where suffering is needless, and where economic progress is blocked by indifference or malice.

This Nation has already erected wide defenses against poverty, against insecurity, and against the needless human suffering which so often prevails abroad. We have insured ourselves against the financial hazards of unemployment, of accidents on the job, against an impoverished old age. Even when the American breadwinner dies his family receives some measure of financial security as a matter of right, not charity. Our system of social insurance—social security—has stood the test of experience, has proven a better bulwark against communism than restrictive legislation or furious speeches.

MAJOR DEFENSE GAP

But now as we mobilize for the third time in little more than three decades, there is still one major gap in our defenses where poverty and needless suffering can strike. We have not yet protected ourselves against the crippling burdens of unexpected illness. We have not yet taken even those steps most necessary to the conservation of our greatest national resource—the health of our people. We face the dangers of atomic bombs, of biological warfare, and unrevealed weapons even more terrible, without taking certain basic measures which military intelligence and common sense demand.

If we are to close these gaps in our health defenses before it is too late, the American people—and particularly their doctors—must have the facts so that they may distinguish between truth and propaganda. We cannot afford the complacency of a Maginot-line complex about our health defenses nor do we want a terrible, shocked awakening to a medical Pearl Harbor. We must recognize the need for action.

PLIGHT OF HEALTH SCHOOLS

To help us avoid both catastrophes has been my purpose for many months in calling national attention to the plight of our medical and public health schools, to the fact that our home front and our Armed Forces abroad may soon be endangered by lack of needed doctors and other health experts. A bipartisan bill to correct this dread deficiency has been called by the President the most vital health legislation before Congress.

Last July 13, I pleaded with the House of Representatives to follow the Senate by unanimously passing the Emergency Health Training Act. This bipartisan measure would enable our financially crippled medical schools to train more doctors, dentists, and other desperately needed health personnel. I pointed out that the ever-deepening Korean crisis threatened us with medical disaster even then.

Leading authorities on medical education testified before members of the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee in support of this measure. Only one organization stood opposed. Yet that one organization prevailed against the interests of the majority.

The gravity of our health needs brought this emergency measure up to a vote four times. Yet the intransigence of one organization blocked transmittal to the House.

Last August 30, in an effort to focus public attention on the Nation's critical health situation, I cited the record of that single obstructing organization, the American Medical Association. In the last three decades, that record has been one of almost unparalleled opposition to social and economic progress, blindness to need, and resistance to reform. I listed 10 major stands, past and present, whereby organized medicine has set its face against the welfare of the American people. The Congress of Industrial Organizations brought these facts to the American community through advertisements in 58 newspapers throughout the country. The American Federation of Labor, through its commentator, Frank Edwards, likewise carried the AMA's tarnished record to millions of listeners from coast to coast.

MASSIVE AMA LOBBY

Despite the fact that the AMA operates the most massive and heavily financed lobby in the country, all the winds of its multimillion dollar propaganda machine could not extinguish those burning truths nor snuff out the resulting fires of public interest.

I would be less than frank or fair if I did not also state that some people doubted whether organized medicine could indeed have opposed social security, workmen's compensation, and so many other measures. Most of these dissenters followed the American tradition of calling for more facts before accepting AMA denials at face value.

Yet one reply, unfortunately, as important as it is unfair, differed from the others. That reply dodged issues, evaded, concealed, denied, and breathed resentment under the title "A Fancy Package of Untruths." It was published in the Journal of the American Medical Association, November 11, 1950. Dr. Elmer Henderson, president of the American Medical Association, wrote that article.

DR. HENDERSON'S CHARGES

He called the CIO's message about organized medicine's record "the same old fancy wrapped package of lies, untruths, half-truths, and part-truths—all aimed at confusing the American people on the issue of socialized medicine." He further said:

It really reveals the ruthless boldness of men who are spreading the cancerous growth of socialism among the people.

He ascribed the origin of the CIO's message to my speech which appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 30, then characterized those remarks as "outright lies"; he denied some charges, agreed to others, and omitted any reference whatsoever to still others.

Dr. Henderson's dismissal of my factual statements and his own revision of American medical history have reached some 145,000 members of the AMA. An unknown number of laymen have also seen it, since organized medicine pays its lobbyists $100,000 a year and provides them with millions of dollars to distribute such material in astronomical quantity. But, in replying to Dr. Henderson and documenting my charges at sufficient length to satisfy the fair-minded observer, I am not very optimistic about the chances of lifting the iron curtain of censorship so evident in the medical press.

In replying to Dr. Henderson, let me repeat what I have said so frequently in the past. I am not charging the individual American physician with the shabby record of the medical lobby. Our doctors are among the world's finest. Their competence and devotion to humanity are justly famous. It is shameful that these dedicated men and women find so seldom in the pages of their medical journals or in the public announcements of AMA officials, the same objectivity toward economic and social problems that characterizes reports on medical advance.

ILLUSTRATION OF AMA ATTITUDE

This never-ceasing misrepresentation of the President's comprehensive national health program is perhaps typically illustrated by the AMA stand on the need to provide our medical and public health schools with Federal funds. I take this issue first because action is so terribly urgent and quote Dr. Henderson in full to give him every benefit to prove his assertion about my "outright lies":

Mr. BIEMILLER said that the American Medical Association blocked Federal aid to medical schools. He is right, but he failed to explain that the bills proposed would lead to control of the medical schools by the Federal Government, either directly or indirectly, with a gradual deterioration of medical education because of political domination. The Association long has held that the problem of financial support for medical schools should be freely in the hands of the communities or States served by these schools.

My charge, then, that the AMA is indeed blocking this measure is not an "outright lie." It is, in fact, true, confirmed by the president of the AMA. Let me in charity allow Dr. Henderson to fall back to a less-exposed position. His essay also categorized the statements by the CIO and myself as untruths, half-truths, and part-truths—all aimed at confusing the American people on the issue of socialized medicine.

EVEN CHARITY CANNOT CONDONE DIVINE RIGHT OF AMA

Dr. Henderson reserves to the AMA exclusive powers to interpret the intent or effect of all legislation. Dr. Henderson says that Federal aid to medical education would be dangerous and hence the AMA stands opposed. This flat statement leaves us to infer that through some latter-day extension of the divine right of kings the AMA can do no wrong. The AMA, according to Dr. Henderson's calm assumption, is thus truth's supreme arbiter, competent to overrule every differing professional and public body, no matter how distinguished or how conservative. That an imposing list of such organizations, too long to cite at this point, does differ with the AMA is not mentioned. Also ignored by Dr. Henderson is the nature of the AMA's past positions on this issue. His omissions may well be deliberate, for if you understand the AMA's turns and twists and tactics on Federal aid to medical education you have the key to its behavior on many others.

My remarks of July 13 attempted such an examination and documentation at length. Hence, the following is hardly more than a running summary of a fuller treatment in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 13, 1950, pages 10116–10124:

In 1946 America's need for more doctors, dentists, nurses, and so forth, was generally recognized. Even the American Medical Association permitted official spokesmen to discuss the need. One such spokesman was Dr. Herman Weiskotten, dean of the Syracuse University College of Medicine and member of the Council on Medical Education and Hospitals of the AMA. He declared that approximately half of our medical schools were operating on budgets far below the essential basic minimum required for the conduct of a satisfactory program. Dr. Weiskotten said:

The American people should realize that the first and most important step in improving the health and medical care of our people is the more adequate support of more than half of the medical schools of this country.

I am sure that at some future date, long after Federal aid to medical education has been adopted, an AMA spokesman will single out those remarks to the exclusion of all others and claim that organized medicine was responsible for its passage.

SHIFT IN TACTICS

But this was an early and temporary admission. The AMA took another turn and found that the serious problem just pointed out by its AMA's spokesman was perhaps not serious after all. In October 1947, Dr. Anderson, secretary of the same council of which Dr. Weiskotten was a member, was far less concerned than his associate. He referred to a study just made by the AMA and made this deprecating statement:

We are prepared to contend that the maximum deficit that could possibly be forecast for 1960 does not exceed 15,000 physicians.

Only 15,000. When you consider that the patient list of the average physician runs between 500 and 1,500, you have some idea of how many people would get inadequate care with such a shortage. It could not conceivably run below seven and a half million people. And this in peacetime. Yet, there you have the statement of a responsible AMA official predicting a doctor shortage, and not worrying about the consequences.

Thus far, how would you describe the AMA's position?

It saw medical education a problem in February 1947. No real problem in October 1947. If that confuses you, then read the 1948 report of the council on medical education of the AMA. It found that our medical schools required an additional $15,000,000 for current maintenance and some $197,000,000 for construction of needed facilities:

The question that remains—said the council—is whether the public will provide this support voluntarily or whether it will have to be provided by direct Federal subsidy.

THE $212,000,000 QUESTION

That, indeed, was the $212,000,000 question. The trouble was the answer. In July 1948, a meeting authorized by the board of trustees was held in New York City. Representatives of universities, business, industry, banking, educational foundations, and private philanthropic organizations discussed a national campaign to raise about $15,000,000 a year to support medical education. A lot of hopes were raised by that meeting, but as of 1950, more than 2 years have not brought this money.

Was there a problem or not, according to the AMA in 1948? Let me return to quote from the AMA report of October 30, 1948, from its council on medical education and hospitals:

These studies have led to the conclusion that there is no need for any great increase in the number of medical graduates and the gradual expansion of facilities for medical education that is taking place will adequately meet the Nation's needs.

Evidently no problem.

Then, in February 1949, Dr. Weiskotten came back again to call attention to a problem after all:

Paradoxic as it may appear in the face of the present plight of the existing medical schools, there is developing a demand that these schools greatly increase the size of their student bodies and that new schools be established.

Of course there was a problem. Each passing month between 1946 and 1948 intensified its complexity while the AMA shifted back and forth between affirmation and denial.

EXPERTS' CONCLUSIONS

Indeed, the problem had grown so critical that the matter came before Congress in 1948. At the close of open Senate hearings, a group of the most distinguished experts in every sector of the professional health training field, including important AMA representation, agreed on a set of 13 general principles. Among these were statements that—

The schools are in a financial emergency.

There are recognized shortages of manpower in the health professions.

Existing private sources of income are not able to meet the needs for either operation or construction.

Federal aid was found necessary. It was even agreed that scholarships as well as operation and construction grants would be helpful in equalizing and expanding educational opportunities for qualified individuals.

This group also formulated legislative guides for the Senate committee. The resulting bill, S. 1453, conformed closely to those guides and passed the Senate unanimously in September 1949. Before passage, at an August meeting in Washington, Dr. George F. Lull, secretary-general of the AMA, told reporters that his organization favored aid to medical education.

HOUSE TAKES UP BILL

After Senate passage, the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee took up the House companion bill, H. R. 5940, which I sponsored. The committee unanimously approved the bill and sent it to the Rules Committee where it died because the first session of this Congress ended. During this entire process, the AMA was rather quiet. Only a few words broke the silence, and they were far from ominous. The AMA's council on medical education reported to the AMA house of delegates in November:

While the council is not entirely satisfied with the bill, it does incorporate several modifications suggested by the council's representatives and it is a distinct improvement over any other bill for Federal aid to education that has been introduced.

HONEYMOON SOON OVER

But the short honeymoon was soon over. In a supplementary report of the board of trustees in December 1949, there was the following statement:

Since S. 1453 has now passed the Senate and since it appears doubtful that further changes will be made by the House in the companion bill, H. R. 5940, the board of trustees feels it must oppose this bill.

There was no official explanation of what happened between November and December. But it is relevant to note that the AMA national education campaign had been at work, all during 1949. According to its report made that December to the AMA, it operated with a record-breaking war chest of $2,200,000. It distributed 55,000,000 pieces of literature condemning the President's national health program as "socialized medicine." Those few facts are highly necessary to an understanding of why the AMA of December reversed the AMA of November. The AMA of December heard its high pressure lobbyists set a militant note. Why tolerate any approval for the President's national health program, particularly when there was a compelling strategic reason to present an unbroken front of opposition? Obviously it was embarrassing to the AMA lobbyists to be in the position of condemning that program, if they had to admit that Federal aid to medical education—the first measure in the President's program—was sound and necessary.

A NEW LINE

So that December 6 to 9, 1949, at the AMA's meeting in Washington, D. C., the AMA unveiled a new line. It declared that the House Federal aid to medical education bill must be opposed as granting Federal officials "too much potential authority to interfere in the internal administration of the medical schools."

I think the analysis of the motivation behind this new line was fairly and correctly stated by the Committee for the Nation's Health. A bulletin issued January 5, 1950, by this national nonpartisan body of independent-minded physicians and laymen declared:

The AMA's stand is based on political and economic prejudice, not medical grounds. The reversal can best be understood as a tactical shift dictated by its opposition to national health insurance. As part of a "defense in depth" policy, the AMA now seems to be weighing every proposal in terms of defending the status quo in medical economics. Consideration of human needs, of training more doctors, increasing facilities, extending preventive care, eliminating the dollar barrier—none of these determines AMA legislative policy. The overriding factors seem to be the potential effect of each measure on:

(a) National health insurance; and

(b) On the control which organized medicine wants to exert over every phase of medical care.

To conduct this campaign without compromise, the AMA hierarchy is forced to go further and further to the right in search of support. Conversely, its defense of the status quo seems to be forcing the AMA into sharper political attacks against liberal programs. To hold its own Maginot line, it must ally itself with other conservative groups, including reactionary elements in the Democratic and Republican Parties. The militant right-wing attitude of the AMA, as revealed at the December meeting, may mean that it will use its war chests to oppose liberal programs in any field where the AMA sees "serious medical implications."

SHORT-SIGHTED ATTITUDE

As 1949 vanished, so did any AMA pretense of sweet reasonableness. On February 12, 1950, the AMA's opposition to Federal aid to medical education was tailored in closed conference—to conform to political requirements that had no reference to or consideration of the Nation's medical needs. How else could any policy be classified except as incredibly short-sighted and deliberately obstructive, when reached on this basis:

From our standpoint, the fundamental question involved in compulsory health insurance is much more adapted to effective, clear-cut presentation than the hidden threat in a bill to provide Federal aid to medical education; the danger in a sickness-disability section of a proposed Social Security program, or the entering wedge for socialized medicine that is adroitly wrapped up in a school health bill.

Instead of being confronted with the task of defeating a revolutionary program of Government medicine, embodied in a single proposal, or in companion bills, we are now faced with a series of measures—disarming in language but dangerous in their provisions—some of which must be beaten and some drastically changed or amended.

No one of the fringe bills, by itself, would usher in a complete system of socialized medicine, but each of the bills is designed to achieve part of that objective.

CLAIM "BACK DOOR" APPROACH

These bills have been described as "the back door" approach to socialized medicine. That is gross understatement. At this session of Congress, the socializers are trying to come in the back door, the side door, and the French window. We can be sure of this, too, that if we relax our work on the main issue, they will soon be battering at the front door again.

These statements are quoted directly from a document which the AMA's national education campaign is evidently not anxious to give public circulation. That document is entitled "Second National Conference, National Education Campaign, American Medical Association." The conference took place at the Drake Hotel in Chicago.

Do not these words fully bear out the analysis of the AMA's new policy of total all-out opposition made by the committee for the Nation's health a month earlier?

Thus, from February 1947 to February 1950, the AMA spun like a weather vane on whether we need to train more doctors, the financial status of our medical schools, whether they require Federal funds, and if so, whether such legislation should be passed. When it came time, a few months later, to induct a new president in June 1950, what policy on Federal aid for medical education was taken? Of the many positions available, Dr. Henderson, with the advice of the AMA's $100,000-a-year lobbyists, made a choice which has been almost universally condemned as tragic.

ALLEGED DOCTOR SHORTAGE

Said Dr. Henderson in his inaugural address about our need to train more doctors and to help medical schools:

The misleading propaganda which has emanated from Washington on this issue is an affront to the American people's intelligence. Typical of this flagrant misrepresentation is the attempt to create a crisis over an alleged doctor shortage in this country. The simple truth is that the ratio of doctors to population is higher in the United States than in any nation on earth except Israel, where the unfortunate refugee doctors of all Europe are gathered. It is equally true, as we are confident most of the people are aware, that the individual physician today can provide far more medical service than even a decade ago, because of technologic improvements. (President's address before the ninety-ninth session of the American Medical Association, San Francisco, June 27, 1950.)

Thus, the AMA returned again to the position of no problem. Dr. Henderson attributed the whole furor to "the barbs and criticisms of a comparatively small group of little men—little men whose lust for power is far out of proportion to their intellectual capacity, their spiritual understanding, their economic realism, and their political honesty. It is the administrative arm of our Government in Washington which has failed us in this generation—a Government which is sick with intellectual dishonesty, with avarice, with moral laxity, and with reckless excesses." (President's address before the ninety-ninth session of the American Medical Association, San Francisco, June 27, 1950.)

"SELFISH, CYNICAL" MEN?

Who are some of Dr. Henderson's "selfish, cynical men" who believe that Federal aid to medical education is urgently required? They include the President, every Republican and every Democratic Senator of the Eighty-first Congress, and the then Secretary of Defense, to cite but a few.

Dr. Henderson conveniently neglected to mention that these "cynical, selfish men" were joined by a most imposing array of professional experts. Their statements appear in full in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 13, pages 10119–10124, and subsequent issues.

DR. SIMMONS' STATEMENT

Brig. Gen. James S. Simmons, retired, dean of the Harvard University School of Public Health and chief of preventive medicine of the United States Army for 30 years, telegraphed the President August 19, 1950:

The shocking news that the House Commerce Committee has tabled the bill for Federal aid to medical and public health schools moves me as president of the Association of Schools of Public Health to appeal directly to you.

I am confident that if the American people realized what a crippling blow this negative action has dealt to the Nation's military and civil-preparedness program they would demand that the tragic mistake be rectified. Health of American fighting men and industrial workers must be conserved by a strong national program of public health and military preventive medicine to guard against diseases as deadly and disabling as bombs and bullets.

Many highly trained specialists will be required. Their postgraduate training is available only in the 10 accredited schools of public health in this country. The financial plight of the 10 schools is such that their total output of specialists is now only one-fifth the number needed to operate the Nation's peacetime health program. Surely the Korean crisis and threat of another global war must make it evident to all that an already critical situation has now become more perilous.

Without added funds the schools are helpless to fulfill their obligation to the Nation. It is obvious that they need emergency financial aid. This is the kind of aid that would be provided by the Federal aid to medical education bill already passed by the Senate and now tabled in the House committee.

I am convinced that one of the most important responsibilities now facing the Congress and the country is to act immediately to insure the training of an adequate and continuing supply of experts in the prevention of disease and conservation of health among our workers and military forces.

It is my earnest belief that the need for swift passage of the bill for Federal aid to medical education is imperative. Its cost compared to enormous outlays necessary for armaments is relatively minor, yet the need it would serve is of major importance to the maintenance of our national strength.

DR. HINSEY'S STATEMENT

Dr. Joseph C. Hinsey, chairman, committee of financial aid to medical education, and dean of Cornell University Medical School, wrote me:

The action by the board of trustees, the house of delegates, and the council on medical education and hospitals of the American Medical Association opposing H. R. 5940 after it had passed your committee and the companion bill S. 1453 after it had passed the Senate was taken independently of our Association of American Medical Colleges and without a poll of our membership. After its study and work with this legislation, this committee is unanimous in its support of H. R. 5940.

STATEMENT OF FIVE DEANS

No less than five deans of leading medical schools declared in a joint letter:

We, the undersigned deans of the professional schools of medicine, dentistry, and public health in the State of Massachusetts, individually and jointly, urge your strong support of H. R. 5940, the bill proposing an emergency 5-year program of grants and scholarships for education in the medical and health fields. We hope that you will work for early priority for this bill in the Rules Committee and will vote for its passage when it comes on the floor of the House.

We are convinced that the present desperate financial plight of our professional schools, not only in Massachusetts but throughout the United States, has already interfered with the quality of professional education and is preventing the development of adequate medical and health personnel for the country.

We make this statement in full awareness of the position recently adopted by the American Medical Association. We vigorously oppose that position. The American Medical Association in adopting its position was in no way authorized to speak for the professional schools of Massachusetts.

Early passage of H. R. 5940 will enable the professional schools of the United States to start immediately on an expanded, more effective total program of training. We do not believe that this urgent need can be met without such assistance.

D. Marshall-Day, M. D., Dean, Tufts College Dental School; George Packer Berry M. D., Dean, Harvard Medical School; James S. Simmons, M. D., Dean, Harvard School of Public Health.

OTHERS AID PROPONENTS

Space considerations reduce me to a mere listing of other distinguished members from the ranks of medicine and education who support Federal aid to medical education despite the AMA:

A. C. Ivy, Ph. D., M. D., D. Sc., vice president of the University of Illinois in charge of the colleges of the health professions; John S. Hirschboeck, dean, Marquette University School of Medicine; W. E. Brown, M. D., dean of the University of Vermont College of Medicine; Robert Hutchins, chancellor of the University of Chicago; P. J. Carroll, M. D., dean of the Creighton University School of Medicine; M. Don Clawson, president of Meharry Medical College; Vernon W. Lippard, M. D., dean of the University of Virginia Department of Medicine; Willard C. Rappleye, M. D., dean and vice president in charge of medical affairs, Columbia University; Samuel Paul Capen, chancellor of the University of Buffalo; Michael I. English, S. J., regent of Loyola University School of Medicine; Sister M. Thomas, O. S. F., dean, College of Nursing, Marquette University; J. Murray Kinsman, M. D., dean, University of Louisville; R. S. Cunningham, M. D., dean, Medical College of Union University.

This list of distinguished supporters of Federal aid to medical education is by no means meant to be complete.

OUTLINE OF AID POSITION

Because a clear understanding of the issue is so important to this Nation's health defense let me emphasize again that these professional leaders differed sharply with organized medicine on three major issues:

First, they declare that the Nation needs more doctors and other health personnel—a need great enough to be called an emergency and to require Federal action.

Second, they urge Federal legislation to provide funds for medical and public health schools since private philanthropy has proved unable to carry so great a burden.

Third, they viewed the stringent safeguards written into such legislation as adequate protection against potential threats of Federal domination or interference.

Despite this most abbreviated presentation, is it not apparent that there is wide-ranging support for Federal aid to medical education; that there are substantial and incontrovertible bases for this support; and the integrity and competence of these supporters are unimpeachable. Yet, all of this testimony Dr. Henderson brusquely ignores or sweeps aside in his heated retort, "A fancy package of untruths."

HOOVER COMMISSION VIEW

But all this is only a portion of the evidence and only a part of the larger picture. I would be at fault if I did not refer you to the Task Force Report on Federal Medical Services, Appendix O. That group of experts serving on the Hoover Commission—the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government—made three recommendations. All three were directed toward surveying and easing the financial crisis of our medical schools—the crisis which the AMA has treated with the sleight-of-hand touch of a knowing magician—making it appear and vanish at will. The Hoover Task Force was concerned with grim realities, not illusions. It soberly stated that Federal Government's legitimate basis of interest:

A sufficient principle on which to justify such Federal aid is that the Government is the largest single customer for medical personnel even in peace, and by far the greatest customer of all in war.

ANOTHER COMMITTEE SEES NEED

Equally important is the recently released report of the Surgeon General's Committee of Medical School Grants and Finances. The AMA was well represented on that committee by a past president, Dr. E. E. Irons, predecessor to Dr. Henderson. I cannot summarize all of the committee's 89 pages of carefully checked data, but here are three of its most important findings:

First. The 79 medical schools of the country need an additional $40,000,000 a year in current operating funds to perform their existing functions adequately.

Second. The schools need about $330,000,000 for construction facilities apart from the above-mentioned $40,000,000 a year in additional operating funds.

Third. The preceding estimates do not allow for any expansion in the number of medical students, only for maintaining profession education adequately for the present number. To carry out the enrollment expansion planned by 55 of the medical schools—bringing an increased enrollment of freshmen students of 22 percent—the deans of these schools estimate that an additional $244,000,000 will be needed for new construction, and an additional $18,000,000 a year for the maintenance of operations.

TURN OF THE AMA SCREW

Perhaps all this incontrovertible evidence was too weighty for the AMA leaders to shrug off. Perhaps even the most myopic of their political propagandists could see that, at the very least, some sort of a grand gesture was needed whereby the AMA could maintain its pressure, perhaps even increase it. So this year's convention, Cleveland, December 6, 1950, produced another turn of the AMA's screw. The AMA's grand gesture was its announcement of a $500,000 fund for medical schools. The turn of the screw was a new multimillion-dollar drive against state socialism as embodied in Federal aid to medical education.

After its announcement ran through the usual stock phrases about the dangers of socialism, the AMA was forced to the grudging admission that this fund was "only the nucleus, and you cannot build very much with only $500,000"—Washington Post, December 7, 1950. A second admission, made by Dr. Louis H. Bauer, chairman of the AMA's board of trustees, concerned that question which so often vexed the AMA in the past: Should it recognize that the medical schools faced a problem? Dr. Henderson, we have seen, denied it in December 1949. But the line changed again, and so Dr. Bauer was saying this December 1950:

Many medical schools, if they were assured a solvent future, would increase their enrollments now. We regard the financing of the medical schools as one of the most pressing problems facing the medical profession today.

A TROJAN GIFT

The total inadequacy of that $500,000 makes the Trojan nature of this gift apparent. This amount is about 1 percent of what the medical schools have declared in the Surgeon General's report is required to permit necessary expansion. It is one five-hundredth of the amount which Federal legislation would make available. Best index of all, it is about one-eighth of what the AMA itself has spent on propaganda in the last 3 years to call the President's national health program socialized medicine. In short, the AMA has already spent eight times as much money on those two smear words as it proposes to allocate to all 79 medical schools of the Nation.

Thus, the AMA fights a rear-guard action, retreating step by step, but resisting bitterly at each opportunity. It seizes upon the device of a campaign for voluntary funds to divert pressure. Either AMA leaders are uninformed or insincere in this newest tactic.

Is not the AMA aware of the efforts of a national foundation, headed by Mr. Herbert Hoover, which is appealing to large corporations and other groups to contribute to the medical schools? This very group of distinguished Americans, including some of the most conservative businessmen in the country, recognizes at the outset that private contributions alone cannot possibly do the job. Their report assumes the necessity of Federal subsidies, sees no dangers arising from the legislation pending before this Congress.

HERBERT HOOVER'S STAND

For the record, here are pertinent quotations from Medical Education in the United States, issued March 1, 1950, by the National Fund for Medical Education, Inc. In his covering note, former President Herbert Hoover states:

Last spring President Conant, on behalf of several university presidents and others, requested me to be the honorary chairman of this fund. Notwithstanding the heavy work imposed by the Federal Government Reorganization Commission, I accepted. I did so because in those investigations we found that our medical educational system was woefully inadequate for the conduct of our national defense and our Federal hospitals for veterans and others. And it is doubly inadequate for the needs of the people generally.

The foreword states:

Federal grants-in-aid may be forthcoming, at least temporarily, but it seems desirable that private sources of support also be stimulated. Thus there will be created a balance between two great sources of support—a balance under which the academic freedom essential to scientific medical education will be preserved.

The problem is put in forthright terms:

America's medical schools are in a precarious financial state. The situation is so grave that some schools may be forced to close their doors unless they can get additional financial support.

In general, the privately supported schools are in the worst condition, but State and municipally operated schools are also staggering under a growing financial burden.

The dangers inherent in such a situation can hardly be exaggerated. Without competent doctors, the practical results of medical research will be virtually lost to the Nation.

The fund would create a balance between public and private support for medical education. Unless the Government—Federal and State—is to be expected to step into the breach on an extensive and permanent basis, private means must be found to reinforce medical and allied scientific education. The Federal Government probably will provide temporary aid to help the medical schools through the present crisis. It would be desirable to enlist private support in an effort to balance public support. This would help preserve academic freedom, leaving the medical schools beholden to no single source for their revenue.

There is now pending in Congress legislation (S. 1453; H. R. 5940) proposing grants-in-aid for medical education. The bill has bipartisan support. It is emergency legislation to meet the very real danger that many medical schools may be forced, eventually, to close their doors. The grants are to be for only 5 years in annual amounts considered necessary to avert this threatened financial breakdown. Proponents of the bill have insisted, wisely, on the 5-year limitation. In this way it may be possible for private agencies, such as the National Fund for Medical Education, to meet, at least in part, these pressing demands.

Among the members of the board of the National Fund for Medical Education, Inc., are such leading businessmen as Winthrop W. Aldrich, Earl Bunting, Carl Byoir, Victor Emanuel, Bernard F. Gimbel, Robert A. Lovett, William S. Paley, Winthrop Rockefeller, Spyros P. Skouras, Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., Thomas J. Watson, and Ernest T. Weir.

ONE AGAINST MANY

The story can now be summarized. On the one side is the American Medical Association's history of equivocation, culminating November 11 in an official declaration by its president, again attacking Federal aid to medical education and accusing the CIO and myself of lying about the AMA position.

Arrayed against the various aspects of the shifting AMA position are the published statements of 20 medical educators and deans, professional organizations like the American Dental Association, the Association of Land Grant Colleges, the American Nurses Association, Committee on Federal Aid to Medical Schools of the American Association of Universities, Committee on Financial Aid to Medical Education of the Association of American Medical Colleges. There are such independent organizations as the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, the 1950 preliminary report of the Surgeon General's Committee on Medical School Grants and Finances.

And finally there is the responsible press of America. Among the many publications and noted commentators which favored this measure and opposed the AMA are the following: Collier's, the New York Times, Dr. James Howard Means in the Atlantic Monthly, Louisville Courier-Journal, New York Post, the Nation, the New Republic, Milton Mayer in Harper's Magazine, and many others.

And all this the AMA lobby would dismiss as a "fancy package of untruths."

Although Dr. Henderson did not concern himself with Federal assistance to State and local public health units, the AMA record is remarkably and significantly similar to that on Federal aid to medical education.

Just last week it blocked rules committee clearance on this bill—also already approved in the Senate with bipartisan support—again using the old excuses about foot-in-the-door legislation.

Well, look at the groups sponsoring this bill and consider just how socialistic their tendencies are. It is interesting to note that one of them, the National Health Council, lists the AMA as a dues paying, participating member organization.

Among the others are: American Academy of Pediatrics; American Farm Bureau Federation; American Heart Association; American Parents Committee; American Public Health Association; American Social Hygiene Association; American Veterans' Committee; Association of State and Territorial Health Officers; General Federation of Women's Clubs; the Midcentury White House Conference on Children and Youth; National Advisory Committee on Local Public Health Units; National Congress of Parents and Teachers; National Foundation for Infantile Paralysis; National Grange; National Health Assembly; National Organization for Public Health Nursing; National Tuberculosis Association; National Young Women's Christian Association; Spokesmen for Children; Young Men's Christian Association, International Council.

AMA ON VOLUNTARY PLANS

Let me move on to document another charge which Dr. Henderson classified as an outright lie. I stated August 30 that the AMA lobby fought voluntary plans when they were first proposed, and even now attempts to harass all those consumer-sponsored plans it cannot dominate. Dr. Henderson dismissed these statements as a "deliberate falsification of the facts," notwithstanding the fact that I quoted directly from the Journal of the American Medical Association and cited instance after instance of AMA opposition to various voluntary plans.

It is interesting that once again, after crying "falsification," Dr. Henderson goes on to corroborate my charge. In his very next sentence, Dr. Henderson says:

Fifteen years ago, the association did oppose some of the so-called voluntary health plans, but for good reason. Certain features were objectionable, and they have long since been eliminated, thereby helping to speed up the growth of the strong voluntary plans as they exist today.

Again, you will note, the abrogation to the AMA exclusively of correct judgment on the social and economic aspects of the delivery of medical care.

Necessarily long as the record was about Federal aid to medical education to support my charges, it would have to be even longer to include all the evidence against the AMA on voluntary plans. A number of volumes have dealt with this subject. Here is just a scattering of the testimony accumulated through the years:

FROM THE AMA JOURNAL

From the Journal of the American Medical Association, December 2, 1932, commenting on the majority report of the famous Wilbur committee on the costs of medical aid which favored voluntary insurance:

So definite was the trend of the committee's studies in this direction (insurance schemes and practice) that one must view the expenditure of almost $1,000,000 with mingled amusement and regret. A colored boy spent a dollar taking 20 rides on the merry-go-round. When he got off, his old mammy said: "Boy, you spent yo' money, but where you been? * * *"

The Journal has pointed out repeatedly that such practices will mean the destruction of private practice; that they represent the exploitation of physicians for gain of business; that they put medical schools into unfair competition with their own graduates; and that they are, in a word, "unethical." * * *

The alinement is clear—on the one side the forces representing the great foundations, public health officialdom, social theory—even socialism and communism inciting to revolution; on the other side the organized medical profession of the country urging an orderly evolution.

From the Journal of the American Medical Association, December 9, 1932, page 2035:

The physicians of this country are the only group with the knowledge, training, and experience necessary to practice medicine. Intent on their daily and nightly task of preventing disease, healing the sick, and ministering to the afflicted, they have given scant attention and but little of their time to a consideration of the way in which their work was being invaded by the octopus of big business. * * * This is the question of Americanism versus Sovietism for the American people.

OTHER SUPPORTING EVIDENCE

In 1934 the president-elect of the AMA attacked voluntary health insurance and predicted that the medical profession's future would depend on the defeat of the present trend toward general socialization, by which term he included voluntary health insurance. See History of the AMA, edited by Dr. Fishbein, page 424.

Dr. Olin West, a high-ranking AMA officer opposed voluntary insurance because it "has always been the forerunner of compulsory insurance," Journal of the American Medical Association, April 12, 1941, page 1085.

CALLED BLUE CROSS "HALF-BAKED"

Since the largest of all voluntary plans is the Blue Cross, let me recall some instances of organized medicine's earlier behavior. When Blue Cross began in 1933, local medical societies opposed it fiercely and received support from the AMA. The Journal of the AMA called Blue Cross "a half-baked scheme" and declared "all sorts of hospitalization insurance schemes" are the "mechanization of medical practice."

When the American College of Surgeons approved the Blue Cross plan in 1934, the AMA's ruling house of delegates promptly smeared the former organization, publicly condemning the college for "an apparent attempt to dominate and control the nature of medical practice." This blast was delivered because the American College of Surgeons was willing to experiment with voluntary prepayment plans for surgical care in approval hospitals and took a direct step toward this end in the face of AMA commands to the contrary—resolution adopted eighty-fourth annual session of the AMA, June 1934. Reported in the Journal of the American Medical Association, page 2195, June 19, 1934.

SAID VOLUNTARY PLANS UNWORKABLE

Organized medicine's resistance to the Blue Cross continued in the thirties. In 1934, the AMA's Bureau of Medical Economics undertook to prove why voluntary health insurance cannot succeed:

Without some form of compulsion voluntary insurance fails of its objective of distributing the cost of sickness among large classes of the population with even approximate fairness. The young and healthy will not join and the aged and sickly, if accepted, will raise the cost to a prohibitive point and, if rejected, remove protection from those most in need. Sickness insurance cannot distribute the burden of sickness among the low-income classes unless it is compulsory. Most of the so-called voluntary schemes have a large element of compulsion in them. This may take the form of making membership in a labor organization or even, as formerly in Denmark, to a certain degree a condition of citizenship. That all such indirect compulsion finally proves ineffective would seem to be indicated by the recent action in Denmark. This country, which has long been hailed by the defenders of the voluntary system as an example of successful operation without direct legal compulsion (although it exercised various forms of indirect compulsion so effectively as to include a larger percentage of the working class than most of the formally compulsory schemes) has adopted a thorough compulsory system, which went into effect October 1, 1944.

FORBADE COOPERATION

As late as 1940, the Wisconsin State Medical Society forbade its local societies to cooperate with Blue Cross. Even today local and State medical society publications are replete with items referring to the animosity of some doctors to voluntary insurance and the efforts of medical cliques to dominate the Blue Cross organization.

Medical Economics, a trade publication which stanchly supports the American Medical Association, has not been able to swallow the AMA's protestations of devotion to voluntary plans. I quote from an article entitled "The Political Makeup of the American Medical Association" which addressed itself to the remarks of Dr. Irons, a past AMA president.

There is no questioning Dr. Irons' sincerity. But it is difficult to reconcile with actuality the popular fiction, which Dr. Irons supports, that the AMA has always fostered experimentation in voluntary prepayment plans. The fact is that the AMA did nothing positive to encourage voluntary health insurance until the formation of associated medical care plans only a year ago, though in 1938 the house of delegates had enunciated certain principles approving voluntary hospitalization plans, reversing an action taken 5 years previously when the plans had been roundly condemned. During the early struggles of the plans, many State and county societies, far from aiding in their development, actually opposed them; and it is reported reliably that AMA officers from time to time expressed consternation at their growing popularity. To Blue Cross executives, among others, the doctrinaire view crediting the AMA with early sponsorship of experimental voluntary prepayment programs emerges as a simple untruth (February 1947, p. 84).

For example, the Louisville Courier-Journal, September 28, 1950, quotes a colleague of Dr. Henderson, Dr. R. Haynes Barr, of Owensboro, Ky. As chairman of the Kentucky Medical Association's campaign committee for "education" in the virtues of voluntary health insurance, Dr. Barr declared that the medical societies "are giving this valuable weapon against socialized medicine nothing more than lip service."

DR. HAWLEY'S LAMENT

Dr. Hawley, chief executive officer of the Blue Cross-Blue Shield commissions, has been frank in telling the national leaders of organized medicine that they must abandon the hostility and indifference to voluntary plans. On June 20, 1948, he told the presidents and officers of State medical associations:

Our national leaders seem to be purposefully blind to the social changes that are taking place. It is impossible to halt a movement by merely refusing to recognize its existence; and this movement toward extending the benefits of adequate medical care to all of our citizens has already gained too much momentum to be halted by any means. The last hope of American medicine lies in abandoning our present position in the rear of the column, where we have been holding back, and establishing ourselves firmly in the forefront, where we can guide and direct the movement into paths that are the best for our people as well as best for our profession. I emphasize that the welfare of our people must be given at least as much consideration as the welfare of the health professions. Too many physicians regard medical care as their exclusive prerogative. We must recognize that the consumer of medical care also has a great stake in it; and, if there has existed any doubt as to this, it should have been dispelled by the deliberations of the National Health Assembly, held in Washington early in May 1948.

The demand for more comprehensive medical care and for an effective means of budgeting its costs has grown within 10 years from a whisper to a roar. Our people will not be denied much longer. If the medical profession does not at once assume the leadership, if it does not at once cease its double talk and double dealing with the voluntary nonprofit prepayment plans and throw its influence squarely and honestly behind these plans, we are going to have compulsory Government health insurance in this country within 3 years.

We cannot afford to waste any more time in fruitless discussions that lead us nowhere. We must decide right now whether we are going to unite in this effort; and if we are, we must cease all delaying and obstructive tactics.

PATENT INSINCERITY REVEALED

All this documents the hostile attitude of the American Medical Association, which now poses as the great defender of the voluntary plans. The patent insincerity of that pose is best revealed by the current history of some of the Nation's most outstanding consumer-sponsored voluntary plans. This entire subject has been thoroughly documented in a report entitled "Restrictions on Free Enterprise in Medicine," published by the Committee on Research in Medical Economics. It outlines some of the instances where consumer plans were forced to resort to court action to gain relief from AMA harassment.

In 1929, Dr. Michael Shadid, together with a group of farm people at Elk City, Okla., began the organization of an ultimately very successful cooperative hospital and insurance plan. The local and State medical societies retaliated with a fierce personal onslaught upon Dr. Shadid, culminating in an attempt to have his license to practice revoked.

At about the same period, the Ross-Loos Clinic in Los Angeles, a well-established private medical group, upon request undertook to furnish prepaid service to some large organized bodies of employees. The local medical society promptly took adverse action, expelling some leading members of the group, even though one of them was a former president of the society. After a long struggle, the expelled members were reinstated. More frequently, the outcome has been the other way, the doctors giving up connection with the prepayment plan, or declining to go ahead with the lay group seeking to organize it. Many plans have thus died aborning.

There follows the description of suits now pending in the courts of two States which rather fully illustrate the methods of medical society restrictive actions.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA V. OREGON STATE MEDICAL SOCIETY

On October 18, 1948, the Attorney General of the United States filed a complaint against the Oregon State Medical Society, the Oregon Physicians' Service (the physicians' insurance plan), various county medical societies in the State of Oregon and certain individual officers of the above-named organizations. This complaint charges that the defendants have been engaged in a combination and conspiracy to restrain and monopolize the furnishing of prepaid medical care.

The specific charges illuminated the methods believed to have been employed. It is charged that the defendants have—

"(a) Hindered and obstructed prepaid medical-care organizations in their attempts to procure and retain qualified doctors to cooperate with them;

"(b) Expelled, threatened, and incited the expulsion from medical societies of doctors cooperating in prepaid medical care plans other than those sponsored or approved by the defendants;

"(c) Formed and promoted their own prepaid medical care plans with the intent to drive out, hinder, and obstruct other commercial medical care plans operating in the State of Oregon;

"(d) Interfered with commercial prepaid medical care organizations other than those sponsored or approved by them in obtaining hospital facilities for their members;

"(e) Refused to treat patients and have caused others to refuse to treat patients who are members of a prepaid medical care plan not endorsed by defendants unless the patient pays cash;

"(f) Refused and encouraged other doctors to refuse to give patients who are members of a prepaid medical care plan not endorsed by the defendants itemized statements that will enable the patient to be reimbursed under the plan to which he has subscribed;

"(g) Refused to consult or assist and have encouraged others not to consult or assist doctors who treat members of a prepaid medical care plan not endorsed by them;

"(h) Spread false propaganda among doctors, hospitals, and the general public for the purpose of discrediting any prepaid medical care plan not endorsed by them;

"(i) Agreed among themselves and with others not to compete with each other for prepaid medical care business or with other similar organizations approved by or affiliated with them, and

"(j) Succeeded in making hospital facilities in Oregon available only to members of defendant Oregon Medical Society and its component county medical societies, and have restricted and excluded other qualified doctors cooperating in prepaid medical plans other than those sponsored or approved by the defendants from access to such facilities."

COMPLETE SERVICE BUREAU VERSUS SAN DIEGO COUNTY MEDICAL SOCIETY

In October 1948 a suit was brought against the San Diego County Medical Society and a number of individual members of the society in the California State Superior Court. The complainants were the Complete Service Bureau, a nonprofit medical prepayment plan sponsored by an organized body of subscribers; and three physicians associated with the bureau.

For over 10 years, the complaint declares, the society has endeavored to obstruct or destroy this health insurance plan. Specifically, the San Diego County Medical Society, continue the charges, has closed its membership to all physicians engaged in service to the members of the Complete Service Bureau, and has sought to visit on such physicians complete business and social ostracism. Medical society members are not allowed to hold professional consultations with them. The bureau doctors are completely barred from the major hospitals of San Diego County, and so are their patients.

Some of the more interesting refinements of the monopolistic practices alleged in the San Diego case are: The medical society, during the year 1947 and since, has attempted to poison the minds of the public against nonmembers of the society. It does this by publishing paid advertisements in the current editions of the San Diego telephone directory, designating the members of the San Diego Medical Society among the physicians listed in the directory. The advertisement contains statements which seek to give the impression that nonmembers of the society are not qualified to practice medicine, do not possess professional qualifications and moral character and do not conform to standards insuring the highest possible quality of service to the public.

Furthermore, read the charges, a medical society sponsored whispering campaign against the bureau has been in progress since 1947. The society members, nurses, employees, and members of their families frequently cause to circulate belittling and derogatory remarks of nonmembers, referring to them as "quacks" and their groups as "outfits" and the prepaid medical plan as a "scheme."

As a consequence, the complaint continues, the Complete Service Bureau has had difficulty in obtaining physicians for its insurance plan, although the bureau has sought for such physicians through various agencies throughout the United States and through advertising in medical periodicals, as is customary in connection with positions open to doctors.

SUPREME COURT UPHOLDS CONVICTION OF AMA

The legal background of the Oregon and San Diego cases is set in perspective by the Group Health Association case. In January 1943 the United States Supreme Court affirmed the conviction of the American Medical Association and the District of Columbia Medical Society for violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

This story began in 1937, when several hundred employees of the Federal Home Owners' Loan Corporation living in Washington formed a nonprofit cooperative organization—the Group Health Association. They obtained a grant of $40,000 from the HOLC, equipped a clinic, engaged doctors, assessed themselves monthly prepayments, got medical care and hospitalization for their members and families, and looked for more members in other Federal agencies.

The District of Columbia Medical Society first attacked the association on legal grounds. The Group Health Association was improperly engaged in the insurance business and in the "corporate practice of medicine," the society declared; but a district court upheld the Health Association's legal position.

Then came direct action by the society. The association's doctors were refused either admission to the medical society, if they came from outside, or if they already were inside, they were expelled from membership. They were refused opportunity to treat association patients in local hospitals. Stories of sick people denied treatment, consultation, or operation appeared in the press. Some of the participating doctors resigned from Group Health but most stood by. Membership grew, public pressure to make local hospitals change their policy mounted, and then, late in 1938, the Department of Justice brought a criminal suit against the American Medical Association, the District of Columbia Medical Society, two other local medical societies, and 18 individual doctors prominent in one or more of these organizations.

The district court convicted and fined the District of Columbia Medical Society and the American Medical Association. The other defendants were acquitted. After their conviction, the case was appealed by the defendants to the Supreme Court.

The unanimous decision handed down by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia is most revealing in its explanation of the legal, economic, and social issues involved in the Group Health Association and similar cases.

Others who have actively promoted voluntary plans can document through their own personal experience the fact which Dr. Henderson and the AMA seek so ineffectually to deny; namely, that organized medicine has long harassed and still harasses those voluntary plans which it cannot control. Let me quote from the testimony presented in May 1950 to the Senate Subcommittee on Health of the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. The speaker is Mr. Horace R. Hansen, general counsel, Cooperative Health Federation of America.

As an enthusiastic supporter of voluntary insurance plans, Mr. Hansen would certainly be well qualified to give the lie to my statement if he found organized medicine an ally, rather than an opponent, as I have stated.

Let us see whether Mr. Hansen's testimony supports or refutes Dr. Henderson:

Mr. Hansen testified in support of S. 1805, a bill embodying the President's recommendations to help voluntary plans in rural areas. This bill is sponsored by Senator HUBERT H. HUMPHREY, Democrat, Minnesota.

HANSEN TESTIMONY

I am frankly very, very surprised that there is any opposition by the American Medical Association or any State society to a bill of this type. I have represented the consumer-sponsored plans and organizations designed to develop them for 12 years, and during that time I have had many negotiations with county societies and State associations and with the American Medical Association. At first there was objection on the part of the profession simply to the idea of prepayment. It was an idea tending toward socialism 10 years ago. The idea simply of budgeting for the cost of unpredictable illness.

Now we find that everyone on all sides and the profession and everybody else agrees to the idea of prepayment. I submit the only question involved in all this controversy is: Who controls the money? And I do not say that lightly, and I want to prove it.

The statements of Dr. Martin and Dr. Erickson pick at the details and ignore the problem. The medical associations and the AMA have said repeatedly, "We are for any good voluntary plan which will produce good medicine. We are opposed to compulsory medicine."

Dr. Erickson, for example, says: "We in Minnesota are proud of the fact that Minnesota is willing to experiment with various types of medical and hospital care plans."

CHARGES FALSEHOOD

That simply is not true, and as long as this has come out, I want to state bluntly how those of us who are in this consumer-sponsored idea feel about this opposition. We have tried in Minnesota in three sessions of the legislature to get a simple enabling act that says people can get together, form a nonprofit association, and make voluntary contracts with doctors. There are plenty of safeguards, State insurance department regulations and all, but there is bitter opposition by the State medical association. There again it was a picking of the details and an ignoring of the whole problem. There isn't any question in my mind that all of these things that are raised by the medical association like lack of freedom of choice, class legislation, and control, or influence by the Surgeon General, are nothing more than techniques used to defeat consumer-sponsored plans and that the real interest of the medical associations is to put down any competition to their own Blue Shield plans. They want to control all medical dollars.

The fight comes right down to the point of not ethics or standards or anything of that kind, but strictly a straight question of economics—whether organized medicine has complete and exclusive control or whether laymen who pay the bills should have some control.

We have no quarrel with the Blue Shield plans, but we think they are inadequate for a lot of reasons. Those plans are catastrophic type of care in most cases. They do nothing by way of improving the standards of the practice of medicine. They do nothing by way of developing group practice, which most doctors would agree is the best way to deliver modern medicine. They do nothing by way of encouraging or doing anything about preventive medicine.

But we say that for all of the reasons I have stated, the Blue Shield plans are very deficient and will never solve the whole problem. What we object to is that the medical profession insists upon monopolizing the field of prepayment.

I have written an article in the current Iowa Law Review of the Iowa University, in which I have listed the restrictive State statutes which State medical associations have obtained and have illustrated the discriminatory practices of doctors—that is, the medical societies—against participating doctors in consumer-sponsored plans.

At the present time the Department of Justice is prosecuting the Oregon Medical Society and several local societies because in Oregon they will not permit laymen to come into the field of prepayment medicine and have anything to do with it. All the laymen want is to have something to say about the financial administration, nothing with the medical part, but just with the financial administration.

DISCRIMINATION SHOWN

The doctors there in organized medicine have discriminated against the doctors in these plans by expelling them from the society, with all of the attendant abuses that the doctor gets as a result of it, the lack of ability to get consultative specialist services or to use the hospitals and so on.

There is another action pending in the State of Washington under the State antitrust laws against the King County Medical Society for the same thing, and in San Diego under the State antitrust law against the San Diego Medical Society. I might say that I have personal knowledge of other prosecutions that will occur in the future in which investigations are now being made.

There is this widespread discrimination, professional discrimination, by the medical societies against participating physicians in plans of this type, as well as the continuous effort by medical societies to get special restrictive legislation giving them complete monopoly in the prepayment field at the same time fighting every attempt we make to get equal or parallel opportunity.

Now, our whole point, Senator, in this—and I am sorry that this had to come into this hearing—is that there should be the same freedom to experiment in this field as in any other segment of the American economy, that there be freedom for the Blue Shield to operate and freedom for our plans to operate too, and that public acceptance be the guide for development in this field of voluntary medical care plans.

That is the American way. I think any restrictive monopolistic practices are obnoxious to our democratic sense, our spirit of free enterprise, and they should be permitted to exist.

ASKS FREEDOM FOR VOLUNTARY PLANS

I think that doctors should accept experimentation in this field with the same spirit in which they accept experimentation in their own medical sciences and that experimentation in the voluntary field is the only way we are going to make any progress. I think if this sort of thing continues we are all going to throw up our hands and say, "All right, we didn't want compulsory health insurance but now since we are blocked at every turn in the road, there is nothing to do but join hands, go down to Washington and ask for compulsory health insurance."

As I noted previously, S. 1805 proposed Federal aid to voluntary nonprofit health-insurance plans. Most of these are in rural areas and have been handicapped by lack of adequate facilities. An administration Senator sponsored the measure. National organizations which support compulsory health insurance favored it.

AMA OPPOSES VOLUNTARY PLAN HELP

And what was the attitude of the AMA—the self-appointed great defender of voluntary health insurance? First, Dr. Walter B. Martin told the Senate subcommittee in behalf of the AMA, May 10, 1950, that these plans required no aid:

I believe that they would oppose, and rightly so, any suggestion that either Federal or State participation is needed or desirable in carrying out their programs.

Again the AMA speaks as the final arbiter of medical economics. The testimony of spokesmen for these rural health cooperatives did not cause Dr. Martin or the AMA to alter their myopic views.

RAISES OLD BOGEYMAN

Dr. Martin raised again the AMA's favorite bogeyman—socialized medicine. He said:

The bill, if enacted, will not only provide Federal funds for the construction of facilities by membership organizations which will be available only for use by members but will also definitely shape the medical-care plans that must be put into operation to qualify the applicant organization for Federal funds. Stated otherwise, Federal direction and control over these medical-care plans will not merely be a possibility but an actuality.

While this bill would apply to a relatively small segment of the population, its enactment would set a pattern of that Federal direction and control over medicine proposed by another measure before your committee, S. 1679, under the provisions of which the providing of medical care to practically the entire population would be federalized and socialized. Many of the fundamental objections to the latter measure are equally applicable to the pending bill.

As further proof of how the AMA's lip service to the voluntary way is rejected by the leaders of consumer-sponsored voluntary plans, let me quote from the statement of October 19, 1950, made by former Congressman Jerry Voorhis, executive secretary of the Cooperative Health Federation of America. This statement was made while the AMA's $1,110,000 advertising campaign was endeavoring to befuddle the American people into believing that the AMA supported voluntary plans:

VOORHIS STATEMENT

The American Medical Association, in one of the biggest advertising campaigns in the Nation's history declares that the voluntary way is the American way. Millions of doctors and patients and potential patients wish the AMA would be consistent. The unfortunate fact is, however, that AMA appears to favor voluntary action only when AMA controls the action. The Cooperative Health Federation of America and other organizations of consumers of medical care have reluctantly been forced to this conclusion.

In State after State organized medicine, that is the State AMA affiliate, has succeeded in recent years in getting legislation passed which virtually forbids the people to take any voluntary action to solve their problem of how to pay for modern medical care. Time and again prepayment plans have been organized by voluntary groups of people only to find that their proposal to share together the risks of illness was against the AMA-sponsored law. To their credit be it said that the Wisconsin Medical Society supported in 1947 an enabling act for that State which reversed this situation and that the Illinois Medical Society gave support to a somewhat similar bill which failed of passage, however, in the legislature of that State in 1950. But Wisconsin and Illinois are exceptions to the general rule. The AMA as a national organization has yet to lift a finger in opposition to laws on the statute books of nearly a score of States which prevent the people taking voluntary action on their own behalf in the field of medical economics.

And the fact is that these plans do not start to benefit anyone until he is so sick he has to go to the hospital. What the people have been trying to do through their genuinely voluntary plans is to cover the major costs of medical care, which are physicians' services, and to provide themselves with such access to preventive medical care as will keep them out of hospitals in the first place.

One is tempted to ask the AMA just who it thinks should have the right to use the voluntary way. Certainly AMA does not refer to doctors when it says this, because doctors with unimpeachable professional qualifications who associate themselves with voluntary group health plans are, except in rare instances, discriminated against, denied admission to medical societies. Where is their right to voluntary action? Certainly AMA does not refer to the people of New York City whose completely voluntary health insurance plan providing comprehensive care to over a quarter of a million people has been under constant AMA attack. The same could be said of the people of many other communities, urban and rural alike. Certainly AMA does not favor the voluntary way for our hospitals, because at its last meeting AMA attempted to dictate to every hospital in the country and say that none of them could have professional people on their full-time staffs. And certainly the AMA is not concerned about the opportunity of medical schools to train an adequate number of physicians, nurses, and technicians nor about the right of people to voluntarily enter the medical profession. For the AMA has opposed the aid to medical education which is so sorely needed especially by the non-tax-supported medical schools if they are to keep their doors open.

The Cooperative Health Federation exists to promote the use of the voluntary method by the people in solving their economic problems involved in the high cost of modern medical care. But voluntary action should be available to all the people and in view of its public record the lip-service of AMA to the principle of voluntarism sounds hollow indeed. The American Medical Association has no right to a monopoly of the opportunity to act in accordance with the voluntary way. The rest of us are Americans, too.

A BRIEF OF THE EVIDENCE

Let me sum up in brief the evidence against the AMA on voluntary plans:

First. There are the statements in its official publication, the Journal of the AMA, attacking the early voluntary plans.

Second. There is a record of restrictive legislation against consumer-sponsored voluntary plans in more than a score of States.

Third. There is the record of court cases including a unanimous United States Supreme Court decision sustaining a conviction against the AMA. Other cases are now before the courts in California, Oregon, and Oklahoma by consumer plans seeking relief from the harrassment of organizated medicine.

Fourth. There are the official statements and testimony of spokesmen for consumer-operated voluntary plans regarding the AMA's lip service to the voluntary way.

Fifth. There is the present opposition of the AMA to S. 1805—a measure to aid voluntary rural health insurance plans.

I challenge Dr. Henderson to present these facts to the 145,000 members of the AMA and prove his charge of falsification.

DR. HENDERSON AGAIN

Here is Dr. Henderson on workmen's compensation:

It might interest Mr. BIEMILLER to know that the association never opposed the principle of workmen's compensation legislation. Any statement to that effect is a deliberate untruth, aimed to mislead the American workingman. During the formative period of this legislation, the American Medical Association did contend that there were certain inadequate provisions for the supplying of medical care to injured workmen, and pointed particularly to the absence of any right given to the injured workman to select his own physician. That stand of the association was to protect the workingman and not to challenge any benefits he might receive.

As in the two previous cases, Dr. Henderson is quick to cry "falsification," "untruth," and so forth, but then is forced to corroborate my statements in the next breath.

NO ALTRUISM INVOLVED

Here is documentation to prove that organized medicine opposed workmen's compensation, and not on the altruistic grounds of concern for the best interest of the American workman. I quote from One Hundred and Forty Million Patients by Carl Malmberg, former information specialist for the United States Public Health Service and a former chief investigator for the United States Senate Subcommittee on Health and Education:

The medical societies were among the most bitter opponents of workmen's compensation when that reform was first proposed. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, was a member of the Ohio State Legislature at that time, and he says, "Now I recall in those days when the medical profession came in in groups and the employers came in in groups and said, 'This will drive us out of Ohio. It will confiscate our property, destroy our profession. It is socialism in the most violent form.' That was back in 1912. Today the employers in Ohio, the medical profession, and labor, are united in support of the bill."

AMA FOUGHT GROUP PRACTICE

Let me quote Dr. Henderson on another charge:

Mr. BIEMILLER said, too, that the American Medical Association fought group practice. * * * The statement actually is silly. The American Medical Association has consistently fought for the highest type of standards in group practice. When any group-practice plan was tied in with a questionable insurance scheme or when a patient was restricted to a particular group of doctors by his insurance policy or when any group-practice plan restricted a patient in the free choice of a physician, the association was never hesitant in voicing bitter objection. This was done in the sole interest of better medical care for the patient.

Again, Dr. Henderson abrogates to the AMA supreme power to decide the economic and social aspects of medical care. In his authoritative volume, Voluntary Medical Care Insurance in the United States, Dr. Franz Goldmann, associate professor of medical care at the Harvard School of Public Health, wrote:

Actually, many of the physicians who in the thirties assumed the leadership in organizing group-practice plans were punished for their action. They were expelled from their medical society and consequently lost the hospital privilege, teaching appointments, opportunity for consultation, the right to accreditation by specialty boards, and the possibility of taking out malpractice insurance policies or obtaining malpractice defense without great cost. Their hospitals were removed from the list of hospitals registered by the American Medical Association.

Let me cite another authority. Louis S. Reed, former member, research staff, committee on costs of medical care, in his book, Health Insurance, states that the AMA's pronouncements about group practice are "so broad that practically any contract arrangement which offers troublesome competition to the private practitioners in a community may be found unethical. Evidence abounds that in community after community the code of ethics has been used as a club to break up contract arrangements which were highly satisfactory to the public served."

Much the same evidence is presented by Oliver Garceau in his volume, The Political Life of the American Medical Association. If further proof is wanted, consult James Rorty's America Mobilizes Medicine, Michael M. Davis' America Organized Medicine, and Medicine at the Crossroads, by Dr. Bertram M. Bernheim, associate professor of surgery, the Johns Hopkins University, and Carl Malmberg's One Hundred and Forty Million Patients.

Now, let us move on to the next charge. Dr. Henderson denies as outright lies that organized medicine opposed vaccination against diphtheria and other contagious diseases by public-health authorities. Dr. Henderson declares that the house of delegates never adopted such a stand and that it did not oppose the reporting of communicable diseases to public-health authorities. He cites in defense a 1925 resolution endorsing preventive medicine, a 1905 resolution commending the American Society for the Control of Cancer, and the work of the woman's auxiliary to the AMA to prevent and eradicate tuberculosis, especially among children. He further states that my comments about venereal disease clinics are ridiculous.

RECORD IS REFUTATION

Again, the record of organized medicine's own actions refutes the statement of its president.

Here is what Louis Reed reports in his book, Health Insurance, Harpers, pages 170–171:

Prior to the depression physicians opposed, but not vociferously, the encroachments of public-health departments upon the private practice of medicine. Physicians were prosperous enough not greatly to mind the nibblings of public-health agencies. There was enough friction, however, to cause public-health officials to be diplomatic in initiating any new activity, lest they incur the wrath of local private practitioners. However, as the depression deepened and private practices dwindled, physicians cast jealous eyes at those who in increasing numbers sought free care from public-health agencies, hospitals, and clinics. And all over the land doctors protested against, and took steps to lessen, governmental competition with private practice. Thus in 1933 the Indiana State Medical Society had its way in a reorganization of the State health department. The society thus announced its victory—as quoted by Mary Ross, Health Inventory, 1934, Survey Graphic, January 1934, page 39:

"There is no need to disguise the fact that there has been * * * considerable cause for criticism of the broadening activities of this branch of government. Attention has been particularly directed toward the work of the Division of Infant and Maternal Welfare, the Hygienic Laboratory, and the subsidization of venereal clinics in different parts of the State. Not only have those branches cost a considerable sum of money, but they have also entered into forms of medical practice which have essentially put the State in competition with the practitioners of medicine. * * * The present set-up is designed to correct these abuses, improve the quality of the proper services of the State board of health, and to effect a saving of probably $75,000 a year.

"Obviously it is impossible for everybody in such a rearrangement to get everything that he might desire. It certainly seems, however, that the organized physicians of the State now have pretty nearly everything that they can reasonably ask."

Louis Reed continues:

All over the country physicians have demanded (1) that health department clinics refuse all patients who by any possibility could pay a private physician for their care; and (2) that services to indigent patients be provided by private practitioners paid on a fee for service basis, and not by salaried physicians in clinics. The method of remuneration would be immaterial to health departments were it not that in the case of most types of services to ambulatory patients, the latter method is by far the more economical. For instance, health departments have tried both methods in immunizing children against diphtheria and in treating patients with venereal disease. Experience has demonstrated that even though private physicians are willing to take as low as $1 a visit, the cost will be considerably more than the cost of providing the services through salaried physicians in clinics.

EXAMPLE FROM RORTY VOLUME

James Rorty furnishes another concrete example of organized medicine's opposition to the development of public health measures in the field of tuberculosis, diphtheria, and other communicable diseases:

During the years 1923–28, the Milbank funds supplemented the health budget of Cattaraugus County, N. Y., by subsidies amounting to half a million dollars. It sought persistently to cooperate with the local medical socity. It paid salaries and gave fellowships to many of the local doctors. It accomplished a highly successful and important demonstration which Prof. C. E. A. Winslow, of Yale, has called one of the most effective and inspiring contributions made to the care of rural public health anywhere in the world. As a result of a 5-year organized attack on infant and maternal mortality, tuberculosis, typhoid, diphtheria, the mortality rate for all these diseases dropped sharply and Dr. Winslow estimated a dividend of approximately 100 percent on the money invested by the fund and by the county.

Seemingly, the county board of health, the board of supervisors, and the taxpayers pretty much agreed with Dr. Winslow's appraisal. Because they backed the project and voted overwhelmingly to increase the county's per capita expenditure out of local taxes for public health work.

It sounds like a success story and a feather in the cap of John A. Kingsbury, who was secretary of the Milbank fund during this period. It was—with this rather important qualification: the demonstration gave rise to a long and bitter holy war, conducted by a minority of the local physicians, who felt that the fund had trespassed upon the sacred preserves of private medicine. * * *

Yet this minority of a minority was permitted by their colleagues to attack the motives, the conduct, and the results of the demonstration and to appeal in the name of the County Medical Society to the State Medical Society and to the board of trustees of the American Medical Association. In the course of the controversy they disseminated far and wide among the American medical profession a series of yellow, blue, pink, and brown books, much after the manner of warring nations justifying to the world at large their political and diplomatic turpitudes and imbecilities. I quote from the Brown Book, issued in August, 1928:

"The whole future of public health work and preventive medicine in the United States is being molded and charted by the controversies which are going on in Cattaraugus County. * * * The drift toward paternalism and pauperization is strong. The tendency toward socialization of medicine is openly avowed by many supporters of the Milbank group. * * * Our medical society thinking primarily of the good of the general public, can honestly do nothing else than protest * * * against such quackery. * * * Cattaraugus County has been the Lexington and Concord of a great battle which must presently be fought out in every corner of the country."

A PHYSICIAN SPEAKS OUT

And again, on page 254, Rorty writes:

It is notorious that from the very beginning the public health services have had to fight the opposition of medical politicians, organized in the local medical societies. On this point we have the testimony of a professor of surgery in a grade A medical school in New York City, quoted in American Medicine, who writes:
